

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

16 for

3/9

Drawn by G. Brown

Copied by J. Brown

A MAN LOADED with MISCHIEF, or MATRIMONY.
A Monkey, a Maggie, and Wife: Is the true Emblem of Strife.

PREFACE.

THE field of history is a wide one, and when the beaten tracks have been well traversed, there will yet remain some of the lesser paths to explore. The following attempt at a "History of Signboards" may be deemed the result of an exploration in one of these by-ways.

Although from the days of Addison's Spectator down to the present time many short articles have been written upon house-signs, nothing like a general inquiry into the subject has, as yet, been published in this country. The extraordinary number of examples and the numerous absurd combinations afforded such a mass of entangled material as doubtless deterred writers from proceeding beyond an occasional article in a magazine, or a chapter in a book,—when only the more famous signs would be cited as instances of popular humour or local renown. How best to classify and treat the thousands of single and double signs was the chief difficulty in compiling the present work. That it will in every respect satisfy the reader is more than is expected—indeed much more than could be hoped for under the best of circumstances.

In these modern days, the signboard is a very unimportant object: it was not always so. At a time when but few persons could read and write, house-signs were indispensable in city life. As education spread they were less needed; and when in the last century, the system of numbering houses was introduced, and every thoroughfare had its name painted at the beginning and end, they were no longer a positive necessity—their original value was gone, and they lingered on, not by reason of their usefulness, but as instances of the decorative humour of our ancestors, or as advertisements of established reputation and business success. For the names of many of our streets we are indebted to the sign of the old inn or public-house, which frequently was the first building in the street—commonly enough suggesting its erection, or at least a few houses by way of commencement. The huge "London Directory" contains the names of hundreds of streets in the metropolis which derived their titles from taverns or public-houses in the immediate neighbourhood. As material for the etymology of the names of persons and places, the various old signs may be studied with advantage. In many other ways the historic importance of house-signs could be shown.

Something like a classification of our subject was found absolutely necessary at the outset, although from the indefinite nature of many signs the divisions "Historic," "Heraldic," "Animal," &c.—under which the various examples have been arranged—must be regarded as purely arbitrary, for in many instances it would be impossible to say whether such and such a sign should be included under the one head or under the other. The explanations offered as to origin and meaning are based rather upon conjecture and speculation than upon fact—as only in very rare instances reliable data could be produced to bear them out. Compound signs but increase the difficulty of explanation: if the road was uncertain before, almost all traces of a pathway are destroyed here. When, therefore, a solution is offered, it must be considered only as a suggestion of the possible meaning. As a rule, and unless the symbols be very obvious, the reader would do well to consider the majority of compound signs as quarterings or combinations of others, without any hidden signification. A double signboard has its parallel in commerce, where for a common advantage, two merchants will unite their interests under a double name; but as in the one case so in the other, no rule besides the immediate interests of those concerned can be laid down for such combinations.

A great many signs, both single and compound, have been omitted. To have included all, together with such particulars of their history as could be obtained, would have required at least half-a-dozen folio volumes. However, but few signs of any importance are known to have been omitted, and care has been taken to give fair samples of the numerous varieties of the compound sign. As the work progressed a large quantity of material accumulated for which no space could be found, such as "A proposal to the House of Commons for raising above half a million of money per annum, with a great ease to the subject, by a TAX upon SIGNS, London, 1695," a very curious tract; a political jeu-d'esprit from the Harleian MSS., (5953,) entitled "The Civill Warres of the Citie," a lengthy document prepared for a journal in the reign of William of Orange by one "E. I.," and giving the names and whereabouts of the principal London signs at that time. Acts of Parliament for the removal or limitation of signs; and various religious pamphlets upon the subject, such as "Helps for Spiritual Meditation, earnestly Recommended to the Perusal of all those who desire to have their Hearts much with God," a chap-book of the time of Wesley and Whitfield, in which the existing "Signs of London are Spiritualized, with an Intent, that when a person walks along the Street, instead of having their Mind fill'd with Vanity, and their Thoughts amus'd with the trifling Things that continually present themselves, they may be able to Think of something Profitable."

Anecdotes and historical facts have been introduced with a double view; first, as authentic proofs of the existence and age of the sign; secondly, in the hope that they may afford variety and entertainment. They will call up many a picture of the olden time; many a trait of bygone manners and customs—old shops and residents, old modes of transacting business, in short, much that is now extinct and obsolete. There is a peculiar pleasure in pondering over these old houses, and picturing them to ourselves as again inhabited by the busy tenants of former years; in meeting the great names of history in the hours of relaxation, in calling up the scenes which must have been often witnessed in the haunt of the pleasure-seeker,—the tavern with its noisy company, the coffee-house with its politicians and smart beaux ; and, on the other hand, the quiet, unpretending shop of the ancient bookseller filled with the monuments of departed minds. Such scraps of history may help to picture this old London as it appeared during the last three centuries. For the contemplative mind there is some charm even in getting at the names and occupations of the former inmates of the houses now only remembered by their signs ; in tracing, by means of these house decorations, their modes of thought or their ideas of humour, and in rescuing from oblivion a few little anecdotes and minor facts of history connected with the house before which those signs swung in the air.

It is a pity that such a task as the following was not undertaken many years ago ; it would have been much better accomplished then than now. London is so rapidly changing its aspect, that ten years hence many of the particulars here gathered could no longer be collected. Already, during the printing of this work, three old houses famous for their signs have been doomed to destruction—the Mitre in Fleet Street, the Tabard in Southwark, (where Chaucer's pilgrims lay,) and Don Saltero's house in Cheyne Walk, Chelsea. The best existing specimens of old signboards may be seen in our cathedral towns. Antiquaries cling to these places, and the inhabitants themselves are generally animated by a strong conservative feeling. In London an entire street might be removed with far less of public discussion than would attend the taking down of an old decayed sign in one of these provincial cities. Does the reader remember an article in Punch, about two years ago, entitled "Asses in Canterbury ?" It was in ridicule of the Canterbury Commissioners of Pavement, who had held grave deliberations on the well-known sign of Sir John Falstaff, hanging from the front of the hotel of that name,—a house which has been open for public entertainment these three hundred years. The knight with sword and buckler (from "Henry the Fourth,") was suspended from some ornamental iron-work, far above the pavement, in the open thoroughfare leading to the famous Westgate, and formed one of the most noticeable objects in this part of Canterbury. In 1787, when the general order was issued for the removal of all the signs in the city—many of them obstructed the thoroughfares—this was looked upon with so much veneration that it was allowed to remain until 1863, when for no apparent reason it was sentenced to destruction. However, it was only with the greatest difficulty that men could be found to pull it down, and then several cans of beer had first to be distributed amongst them as an incentive to action—in so great veneration was the old sign held even by the lower orders of the place. Eight pounds were paid for this destruction, which, for fear of a riot, was effected at three in the morning, "amid the groans and hisses of the assembled multitude," says a local paper. Previous to the demolition the greatest excitement had existed in the place ; the newspapers were filled with articles ; a petition with 400 signatures—including an M.P., the prebends, minor canons, and clergy of the cathedral—prayed the local "commissioners" that the sign might be spared ; and the whole community was in an uproar. No sooner was the old portrait of Sir John removed than another was put up ; but this representing the knight as seated, and with a can of ale by his side, however much it may suit the modern publican's notion of military ardour, does not please the owner of the property, and a fac-simile of the time-honoured original is in course of preparation.

Concerning the internal arrangement of the following work, a few explanations seem necessary.

Where a street is mentioned without the town being specified, it in all cases refers to a London thoroughfare.

The trades tokens so frequently referred to, it will be scarcely necessary to state, were the brass farthings issued by shop or tavern keepers, and generally adorned with a representation of the sign of the house. Nearly all the tokens alluded to belong to the latter part of the seventeenth century, mostly to the reign of Charles II.

As the work has been two years in the press, the passing events mentioned in the earlier sheets refer to the year 1864.

In a few instances it was found impossible to ascertain whether certain signs spoken of as existing really do exist, or whether those mentioned as things of the past are in reality so. The wide distances at which they are situated prevented personal examination in every case, and local histories fail to give such small particulars.

The rude unattractive woodcuts inserted in the work are in most instances fac-similes, which have been chosen as genuine examples of the style in which the various old signs were represented. The blame of the coarse and primitive execution, therefore, rests entirely with the ancient artist, whether sign painter or engraver.

Translations of the various quotations from foreign languages have been added for the following reasons:—It was necessary to translate the numerous quotations from the Dutch signboards; Latin was Englished for the benefit of the ladies, and Italian and French extracts were Anglicised to correspond with rest.

Errors, both of fact and opinion, may doubtless be discovered in the book. If, however, the compilers have erred in a statement or an explanation, they do not wish to remain in the dark, and any light thrown upon a doubtful passage will be acknowledged by them with thanks. Numerous local signs—famous in their own neighbourhood—will have been omitted, (generally, however, for the reasons mentioned on a preceding page,) whilst many curious anecdotes and particulars concerning their history may be within the knowledge of provincial readers. For any information of this kind the compilers will be much obliged; and should their work ever pass to a second edition, they hope to avail themselves of such friendly contributions.

LONDON, June 1866.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
CHAPTER X.
DIGNITIES, TRADES, AND PROFESSIONS,	305
CHAPTER XI.
THE HOUSE AND THE TABLE,	373
CHAPTER XII.
DRESS; PLAIN AND ORNAMENTAL,	399
CHAPTER XIII.
GEOGRAPHY AND TOPOGRAPHY,	414
CHAPTER XIV.
HUMOROUS AND COMIC,	437
CHAPTER XV.
PUNS AND REBUSES,	469
CHAPTER XVI.
MISCELLANEOUS SIGNS,	476
APPENDIX.
BONNELL THORNTON'S SIGNBOARD EXHIBITION,	512
INDEX OF ALL THE SIGNS MENTIONED IN THE WORK,	527

PLATE I.

BAKER.
(Pompeii, A.D. 70.)

DAIRY.
(Pompeii, A.D. 70.)

SHOEMAKER.
(Herculaneum.)

WINE MERCHANT.
(Pompeii, A.D. 70.)

TWO JOLLY BREWERS.
(Bank's's Bills, 1770.)

and our proverb, "Good Wine needs no Bush." An ansa, or handle of a pitcher, was the sign of their post-houses, (stathmoi or allagæ), and hence these establishments were afterwards denominated ansæ.^{*} That they also had painted signs, or exterior decorations which served their purpose, is clearly evident from various authors :—

"Quum victi Mures Mustelarum exercitu
(Historia quorum in tabernis pingitur.)"[†]

PHÆDRUS, lib. iv. fab. vi.

These Roman street pictures were occasionally no mean works of art, as we may learn from a passage in Horace :—

"Contento poplite miror
Proelia, rubrico picta aut carbone; velut si
Re vera pugnent, feriant vitentque moventes
Arma viri."[‡]

Cicero also is supposed by some scholars to allude to a sign when he says :—

"Jam ostendamcujus modi sis : quum ille 'ostende quæso' demonstravi digito pictum Gallum in Mariano scuto Cimbrico, sub Novis, distortum ejectâ linguâ, buccis fluentibus, risus est commotus."[§]

Pliny, after saying that Lucius Mummius was the first in Rome who affixed a picture to the outside of a house, continues :—

"Deinde video et in foro positas vulgo. Hinc enim Crassi oratoris lepos, [here follows the anecdote of the Cock of Marius the Cimbrian] . . . In foro fuit et illa pastoris senis cum baculo, de qua Teutonorum legatus respondit, interrogatus quanti eum æstimaret, sibi donari nolle talem vivum verumque."^{||}

Fabius also, according to some, relates the story of the cock, and his explanation is cited :—"Taberna autem erant circa Forum, ac scutum illud signi gratia positum."[¶]

But we can judge even better from an inspection of the Roman ^{*} Hearne, Antiq. Disc., i. 39.

[†] "When the mice were conquered by the army of the weasels, (a story which we see painted on the taverns.)"

[‡] Lib. ii. sat. vii. : "I admire the position of the men that are fighting, painted in red or in black, as if they were really alive ; striking and avoiding each other's weapons, as if they were actually moving."

[§] De Oratore, lib. ii. ch. 71 : "Now I shall shew you how you are, to which he answered, 'Do, please.' Then I pointed with my finger towards the Cock painted on the signboard of Marius the Cimbrian, on the New Forum, distorted, with his tongue out and hanging cheeks. Everybody began to laugh."

^{||} Hist. Nat., xxxv. ch. 8 : "After this I find that they were also commonly placed on the Forum. Hence that joke of Crassus, the orator. . . . On the Forum was also that of an old shepherd with a staff, concerning which a German legate, being asked at how much he valued it, answered that he would not care to have such a man given to him as a present, even if he were real and alive."

[¶] "There were, namely, taverns round about the Forum, and that picture [the Cock] had been put up as a sign."

tree ; Leo, a lion ; Doleus, father and son, two casks ; Herbacia, two baskets of herbs ; and Porcula, a pig. Now it seems most probable that, since these emblems were used to indicate where a baker, a carpenter, or a tire-woman was buried, they would adopt similar symbols above ground, to acquaint the public where a baker, a carpenter, or a tire-woman lived.

We may thus conclude that our forefathers adopted the sign-board from the Romans ; and though at first there were certainly not so many shops as to require a picture for distinction,—as the open shop-front did not necessitate any emblem to indicate the trade carried on within,—yet the inns by the road-side, and in the towns, would undoubtedly have them. There was the Roman bush of evergreens to indicate the sale of wine ;* and certain devices would doubtless be adopted to attract the attention of the different classes of wayfarers, as the Cross for the Christian customer,† and the Sun or the Moon for the pagan. Then we find various emblems, or standards, to court respectively the custom of the Saxon, the Dane, or the Briton. He that desired the patronage of soldiers might put up some weapon ; or, if he sought his customers among the more quiet artificers, there were the various implements of trade with which he could appeal to the different mechanics that frequented his neighbourhood.

Along with these very simple signs, at a later period, coats of arms, crests, and badges, would gradually make their appearance at the doors of shops and inns. The reasons which dictated the choice of such subjects were various. One of the principal was this. In the Middle Ages, the houses of the nobility, both in town and country, when the family was absent, were used as hostels for travellers. The family arms always hung in front of the house, and the most conspicuous object in those arms gave a name to the establishment amongst travellers, who, unacquainted with the mysteries of heraldry, called a lion gules or azure by the vernacular name of the Red or Blue Lion.‡ Such coats of arms gradually became a very popular intimation that there was—

* The Bush certainly must be counted amongst the most ancient and popular of signs. Traces of its use are not only found among Roman and other old-world remains, but during the Middle Ages we have evidence of its display. Indications of it are to be seen in the Bayeux tapestry, in that part where a house is set on fire, with the inscription, Hic domus incenditur, next to which appears a large building, from which projects something very like a pole and a bush, both at the front and the back of the building.

† In Cædmon's Metrical Paraphrase of Scripture History, (circa A.D. 1000,) in the drawings relating to the history of Abraham, there are distinctly represented certain cruciform ornaments painted on the walls, which might serve the purpose of signs. (See upon this subject under "RELIGIOUS SIGNS.") it followed that the same subjects were naturally often repeated, introducing only a change in the colour for a difference.

‡ The palace of St Laurence Poulteney, the town residence of Charles Brandon,

Since all the pictorial representations were, then, of much the same quality, rival tradesmen tried to outvie each other in the size of their signs, each one striving to obtrude his picture into public notice by putting it out further in the street than his neighbour's. The "Liber Albus," compiled in 1419, names this subject amongst the Inquisitions at the Wardmotes: "Item, if the ale-stake of any tavern is longer or extends further than ordinary." And in book iii. part iii. p. 389, is said:—

"Also, it was ordained that, whereas the ale-stakes projecting in front of taverns in Chepe, and elsewhere in the said city, extend too far over the King's highways, to the impeding of riders and others, and, by reason of their excessive weight, to the great deterioration of the houses in which they are fixed;—to the end that opportune remedy might be made thereof, it was by the Mayor and Aldermen granted and ordained, and, upon summons of all the taverners of the said city, it was enjoined upon them, under pain of paying forty pence* unto the Chamber of the Guildhall, on every occasion upon which they should transgress such ordinance, that no one of them in future should have a stake, bearing either his sign, or leaves, extending or lying over the King's highway, of greater length than seven feet at most, and that this ordinance should begin to take effect at the Feast of Saint Michael, then next ensuing, always thereafter to be valid and of full effect."

The booksellers generally had a woodcut of their signs for the colophon of their books, so that their shops might get known by the inspection of these cuts. For this reason, Benedict Hector, one of the early Bolognese printers, gives this advice to the buyers in his "Justinus et Florus:"—

"Emptor, attende quando vis emere libros formatos in officina mea excussoria, inspicie signum quod in liminari pagina est, ita nunquam falleris. Nam quidam malevoli Impressores libris suis inemendatis et maculosis apponunt nomen meum ut fiant vendibiliore."†

Jodocus Badius of Paris, gives a similar caution:—

"Oratum facimus lectorem ut signum inspiciat, nam sunt qui titulum nomenque Badianum mentiantur et laborem suffurentur."‡

Aldus, the great Venetian printer, exposes a similar fraud, and points out how the pirate had copied the sign also in his colophon; but, by inadvertency, making a slight alteration:—

* Rather a heavy fine, as the best ale at that time was not to be sold for more than three-halfpence a gallon.

† "Purchaser, be aware when you wish to buy books issued from my printing-office. Look at my sign, which is represented on the title-page, and you can never be mistaken. For some evil-disposed printers have affixed my name to their uncorrected and faulty works, in order to secure a better sale for them."

‡ "We beg the reader to notice the sign, for there are men who have adopted the same title, and the name of Badius, and so slich our labour."

period, still bear witness. In provincial towns and villages, where there was sufficient room in the streets, the sign was generally suspended from a kind of small triumphal arch, standing out in the road, partly wood, partly iron, and ornamented with all that carving, gilding, and colouring could bestow upon it, (see description of White-Hart Inn at Scole.) Some of the designs of this class of ironwork have come down to us in the works of the old masters, and are indeed exquisite.

Painted signs then, suspended in the way we have just pointed out, were more common than those of any other kind; yet not a few shops simply suspended at their doors some prominent article in their trade, which custom has outlived the more elegant signboards, and may be daily witnessed in our streets, where the ironmonger's frying-pan, or dust-pan, the hardware-dealer's teapot, the grocer's tea-canister, the shoemaker's last or clog, with the Golden Boot, and many similar objects, bear witness to this old custom.

Lastly, there was in London another class of houses that had a peculiar way of placing their signs—viz., the Stews upon the Bank-side, which were, by a proclamation of 37 Hen. VIII., "whited and painted with signs on the front, for a token of the said houses." Stow enumerates some of these symbols, such as the Cross-Keys, the Gun, the Castle, the Crane, the Cardinal's Hat, the Bell, the Swan, &c.

Still greater variety in the construction of the signs existed in France; for besides the painted signs in the iron frames, the shopkeepers in Paris, according to H. Sauval, ("Antiquités de la Ville de Paris,") had anciently banners hanging above their doors, or from their windows, with the sign of the shop painted on them; whilst in the sixteenth century carved wooden signs were very common. These, however, were not suspended, but formed part of the wooden construction of the house; some of them were really chefs-d'œuvres, and as careful in design as a carved cathedral stall. Several of them are still remaining in Rouen and other old towns; many also have been removed and placed in various local museums of antiquities. The most general rule, however, on the Continent, as in England, was to have the painted signboard suspended across the streets.

An observer of James I.'s time has jotted down the names of all the inns, taverns, and side streets in the line of road between Charing Cross and the old Tower of London, which document lies now embalmed amongst the Harl. MS., 6850, fol. 31. In imagination we can walk with him through the metropolis:—

PLATE I.

BAKER.
(Pompeii, A.D. 70.)

DAIRY.
(Pompeii, A.D. 70.)

SHOEMAKER.
(Herculaneum.)

WINE MERCHANT.
(Pompeii, A.D. 70.)

TWO JOLLY BREWERS.
(Banks's Bill, 1770.)

into the Cat and Wheel ; such ridiculous reformation, and so jealous they are again as they would pluck down the Cat and Fish, "that they might not hear it." No doubt they invented very godly signs, but these have not come down to us.

At that time, also, a fashion prevailed which continued, indeed, as long as the signboard was an important institution—of using house-signs to typify political ideas. Imaginary signs, as a part of secret imprints, conveying most unmistakably the sentiments of the book, were often used in the old days of political plots and violent lampoons. Instance the following :—

"VOX BOREALIS, or a Northerne Discoverie, by Way of Dialogue, between Jamie and Willie. Amidst the Babylonians—printed by Margery Marprelate, in Thwaek Coat Lane, at the sign of the Crab-Tree Cudgell, without any privilege of the Catercaps. 1641."

"ARTICLES OF HIGH TREASON made and enacted by the late Halfquarter usurping Convention, and now presented to the publick view for a general satisfaction of all true Englishmen. Imprinted for Erasmus Thorogood, and to be sold at the signe of the Roasted Rump. 1659."

"A CATALOGUE OF BOOKS of the Newest Fashion, to be sold by auction at the Whigs' Coffeehouse, at the sign of the Jackanapes in Prating Alley, near the Deanery of Saint Paul's."

"THE CENSURE OF THE ROTA upon Mr Milton's book, entitled 'The Ready and Easy Way to Establish a Free Commonwealth,' &c. Printed at London by Paul Giddy, Printer to the Rota, at the sign of the Windmill, in Turn-again Lane. 1660."

"AN ADDRESS from the Ladies of the Provinces of Munster and Leinster to their Graces the Duke and Duchess of D——t, Lord G——, and Caiaphas the High Priest, with sixty original toasts, drank by the Ladies at their last Assembly, with Love-letters added. London: Printed for John Pro Patria, at the sign of Vivat Rex. 1754."

"CHIVALRY no Trifle, or the Knight and his Lady: a Tale. To which is added the Hue and Cry after Touzer and Spitfire, the Lady's two lap-dogs. Dublin: Printed at the sign of Sir Tady's Press, etc. 1754."

"AN ADDRESS from the Influential Electors of the County and City of Galway, with a Collection of 60 Original Patriot Toasts and 48 Munster Toasts, with Intelligence from the Kingdom of Eutopia. Printed at the sign of the Pirate's Sword in the Captain's Scabbard. London, 1754."

"THE C——t's APOLOGY to the Freeholders of this Kingdom for their conduct, containing some Pieces of Humour, to which is added a Bill of C——t Morality. London: Printed at the sign of Betty Ireland, d——d of a Tyrant in Purple, a Monster in Black, etc."

In the newspapers of the eighteenth century, we find that signs were constantly used as emblems of, or as sharp hits at, the politics of the day ; thus, in the Weekly Journal for August 17, 1718, allusions are made to the sign of the Salutation, in Newgate Street, by the opposition party, to which the Original

THE HISTORY OF SIGNBOARDS.

At midst of the day, they parted away,
To seaverall places to dine.

The Gentry went to the King's Head,
The Nobles unto the Crowne;
The Knights went to the Golden Fleece,
And the Ploughmen to the Clowne.

The Cleargie will dine at the Miter,
The Vintners at the Three Tunnes,
The Usurers to the Devill will goe,
And the Fryers to the Nunnes.

The Ladyes will dine at the Feathers,
The Globe no Captaine will scorne,
The Huntsmen will goe to the Grayhound below,
And some Townes-men to the Horne.

The Plummers will dine at the Fountaine,
The Cookes at the Holly Lambe,
The Drunkerds by noone, to the Man in the Moone,
And the Cuckholdes to the Ramme.

The Roarers will dine at the Lyon,
The Watermen at the Old Swan;
And Bawdes will to the Negro goe,
And Whores to the Naked Man.

The Keepers will to the White Hart,
The Marchants unto the Shippe,
The Beggars they must take their way
To the Egge-shell and the Whippe.

The Farryers will to the Horse,
The Blacksmith unto the Locke,
The Butchers unto the Bull will goe,
And the Carmen to Bridewell Clocke.

The Fishmongers unto the Dolphin,
The Barbers to the Cheat Loafe,^{*}
The Turners unto the Ladle will goe,
Where they may merrylic quaffe.

The Taylors will dine at the Sheeres,
The Shooemakers will to the Boote,
The Welshmen they will take their way,
And dine at the signe of the Gote.

The Hosiers will dine at the Legge,
The Drapers at the signe of the Brush,
The Fletchers to Robin Hood will goe,
And the Spendthrift to Begger's Bush.

The Pewterers to the Quarte Pot,
The Coopers will dine at the Hoope,
The Coblers to the Last will goe,
And the Bargemen to the Sloope.

^{*} A Cheat loaf was a household loaf, wheaten seconds bread.—Nares's Glossary.

The Huntsmen to the White Hart,
 To the Ship the Merchants goe,
 But you that doe the Muses love,
 The sign called River Po.

The Banquerout to the World's End,
 The Fool to the Fortune hie,
 Unto the Mouth the Oyster-wife,
 The Fiddler to the Pie.

The Punk unto the Cockatrice,*
 The Drunkard to the Vine,
 The Begger to the Bush, there meet,
 And with Duke Humphrey dine."†

After the great fire of 1666, many of the houses that were rebuilt, instead of the former wooden signboards projecting in the streets, adopted signs carved in stone, and generally painted or gilt, let into the front of the house, beneath the first floor windows. Many of these signs are still to be seen, and will be noticed in their respective places. But in those streets not visited by the fire, things continued on the old footing, each shop-keeper being fired with a noble ambition to project his sign a few inches farther than his neighbour. The consequence was that, what with the narrow streets, the penthouses, and the signboards, the air and light of the heavens were well-nigh intercepted from the luckless wayfarers through the streets of London. We can picture to ourselves the unfortunate plumed, feathered, silken gallant of the period walking, in his low shoes and silk stockings, through the ill-paved dirty streets, on a stormy November day, when the honours were equally divided between fog, sleet, snow, and rain, (and no umbrellas, be it remembered,) with flower-pots blown from the penthouses, spouts sending down shower-baths from almost every house, and the streaming signs swinging overhead on their rusty, creaking hinges. Certainly the evil was great, and demanded that redress which Charles II. gave in the seventh year of his reign, when a new Act "ordered that in all the streets no signboard shall hang across, but that the sign shall be fixed against the balconies, or some convenient part of the side of the house."

The Parisians, also, were suffering from the same enormities; everything was of Brobdignagian proportions. "J'ai vu," says an essayist of the middle of the seventeenth century, "suspendu aux boutiques des volants de six pieds de hauteur, des perles grosses

* This was in those days a slang term for a mistress.

† &c. Walk about in St Paul's during the dinner hour.

so that a shopkeeper at a loss for an inscription had only to open the book and make his selection; for there were rhymes in it both serious and jocular, suitable to everybody's taste. The majority of the Dutch signboard inscriptions of that day seem to have been eminently characteristic of the spirit of the nation. No such inscriptions could be brought before "a discerning public," without the patronage of some holy man mentioned in the Scriptures, whose name was to stand there for no other purpose than to give the Dutch poet an opportunity of making a jingling rhyme; thus, for instance,—

"Jacob was David's neef maar 't waren geen Zwagers.
Hier slypt men allerhande Barbiers gereedschappen, ook voor vischwyven en slagers."*

Or another example:—

"Men vischte Moses uit de Biezen, Hier trekt men tanden en Kiezen."†

In the beginning of the eighteenth century, we find the following signs named, which puzzled a person of an inquisitive turn of mind, who wrote to the British Apollo,‡ (the meagre Notes and Queries of those days,) in the hope of eliciting an explanation of their quaint combination:—

"I'm amazed at the Signs
As I pass through the Town,
To see the odd mixture:
A Magpie and Crown,
The Whale and the Crow,
The Razor and Hen,
The Leg and Seven Stars,
The Axe and the Bottle,
The Tun and the Lute,
The Eagle and Child,
The Shovel and Boot."

All these signs are also named by Tom Brown:§—"The first amusements we encountered were the variety and contradictory language of the signs, enough to persuade a man there were no rules of concord among the citizens. Here we saw Joseph's Dream, the Bull and Mouth, the Whale and Crow, the Shovel and Boot, the Leg and Star, the Bible and Swan, the Frying-pan and Drum,

* "Jacob was David's nephew, but not his brother-in-law.

All sorts of barbers' tools ground here, also fishwives' and butchers' knives."

† "Moses was pick'd up among the rushes.
Teeth and grinders drawn here."

‡ The British Apollo, 1710, vol. iii. p. 34.

§ Amusements for the Meridian of London, 1708, p. 72.

in this, too, the publicans are notoriously faulty. The King's Arms, and the Star and Garter, are aptly enough placed at the court end of the town, and in the neighbourhood of the royal palace; Shakespeare's Head takes his station by one playhouse, and Ben Jonson's by the other; Hell is a public-house adjoining to Westminster Hall, as the Devil Tavern is to the lawyers' quarter in the Temple: but what has the Crown to do by the 'Change, or the Gun, the Ship, or the Anchor anywhere but at Tower Hill, at Wapping, or Deptford?

"It was certainly from a noble spirit of doing honour to a superior desert, that our forefathers used to hang out the heads of those who were particularly eminent in their professions. Hence we see Galen and Paracelsus exalted before the shops of chemists; and the great names of Tully, Dryden, and Pope, &c., immortalised on the rubric posts* of booksellers, while their heads denominate the learned repositories of their works. But I know not whence it happens that publicans have claimed a right to the physiognomies of kings and heroes, as I cannot find out, by the most painful researches, that there is any alliance between them. Lebec, as he was an excellent cook, is the fit representative of luxury; and Broughton, that renowned athletic champion, has an indisputable right to put up his own head if he pleases; but what reason can there be why the glorious Duke William should draw porter, or the brave Admiral Vernon retail flip? Why must Queen Anne keep a ginshop, and King Charles inform us of a skittle-ground? Propriety of character, I think, require that these illustrious personages should be deposed from their lofty stations, and I would recommend hereafter that the alderman's effigy should accompany his Intire Butt Beer, and that the comely face of that public-spirited patriot who first reduced the price of punch and raised its reputation Pro Bono Publico, should be set up wherever three penn'orth of warm rum is to be sold.

"I have been used to consider several signs, for the frequency of which it is difficult to give any other reason, as so many hieroglyphics with a hidden meaning, satirising the follies of the people, or conveying instruction to the passer-by. I am afraid that the stale jest on our citizens gave rise to so many Horns in public streets; and the number of Castles floating with the wind to posterity," says a writer in the Gentleman's Magazine, "that long after signs became unnecessary, it was not unusual for an opulent shopkeeper to lay out as much upon a sign, and the curious ironwork with which it was fixed in the house, so as to project nearly in the middle of the street, as would furnish a less considerable dealer with a stock in trade. I have been credibly informed that there were many signs and sign irons upon Ludgate Hill which cost several hundred pounds, and that as much was laid out by a mercer on the sign of the Queen's Head, as would have gone a good way towards decorating the original for a birthday." Misson, a French traveller who visited England in 1719, thus speaks about the signs :—

* From Martial and other Latin poets, we learn that it was usual for the bibliopoles of those days to advertise new works by affixing copies of the title-pages to a post outside their shops; but whether this method obtained in the last century, the history of Paternoster Row does not inform us.

"By a decree of the police, the signs of Paris must be small, and not too far advanced from the houses. At London, they are commonly very large, and jut out so far, that in some narrow streets they touch one another; nay, and run across almost quite to the other side. They are generally adorned with carving and gilding; and there are several that, with the branches of iron which support them, cost above a hundred guineas. They seldom write upon the signs the name of the thing represented in it, so that there is no need of Molière's inspector. But this does not at all please the German and other travelling strangers; because, for want of the things being so named, they have not an opportunity of learning their names in England, as they stroll along the streets. Out of London, and particularly in villages, the signs of inns are suspended in the middle of a great wooden portal, which may be looked upon as a kind of triumphal arch to the honour of Bacchus."

M. Grosley, another Frenchman, who made a voyage through England in 1765, makes very similar remarks. As soon as he landed at Dover, he observes,—

"I saw nothing remarkable, but the enormous size of the public-house signs, the ridiculous magnificence of the ornaments with which they are overcharged, the height of a sort of triumphal arches that support them, and most of which cross the streets," &c. Elsewhere he says, "In fact nothing can be more inconsistent than the choice and the placing of the ornaments, with which the signposts and the outside of the shops of the citizens are loaded."

But gaudy and richly ornamented as they were, it would seem that, after all, the pictures were bad, and that the absence of inscriptions was not to be lamented, for those that existed only "made fritters of English." The Tatler, No. 18, amused his readers at the expense of their spelling :—"There is an offence I have a thousand times lamented, but fear I shall never see remedied, which is that, in a nation where learning is so frequent as in Great Britain, there should be so many gross errors as there public interest and excitement abated, and matters remained as they were.

In the year 1762 considerable attention was directed to signboards by Bonnell Thornton, a clever wag, who, to burlesque the exhibitions of the Society of Artists, got up an Exhibition of Signboards. In a preliminary advertisement, and in his published catalogue, he described it as the "EXHIBITION OF THE SOCIETY OF SIGN-PAINTERS of all the curious signs to be met with in town or country, together with such original designs as might be transmitted to them, as specimens of the native genius of the nation." Hogarth, who understood a joke as well as any man in England, entered into the spirit of the humour, was on the hanging committee, and added a few touches to heighten the absurdity. The whole affair proved a great success.*

This comical exhibition was the greatest glory to which signboards were permitted to attain, as not more than four years after they had a fall from which they never recovered. Education had now so generally spread, that the majority of the people could read sufficiently well to decipher a name and a number. The continual exhibition of pictures in the streets and thoroughfares consequently became useless; the information they conveyed could be imparted in a more convenient and simple manner, whilst their evils could be avoided. The strong feeling of corporations, too, had set in steadily against signboards, and henceforth they were doomed.

Paris, this time, set the example: by an act of September 17, 1761, M. de Sartines, Lieutenant de Police, ordered that, in a month's time from the publication of the act, all signboards in Paris and its suburbs were to be fixed against the walls of the houses, and not to project more than four inches, including the border, frame, or other ornaments;—also, all the signposts and sign irons were to be removed from the streets and thoroughfares, and the passage cleared.

London soon followed: in the Daily News, November 1762, we find:—"The signs in Duke's Court, St Martin's Lane, were all taken down and affixed to the front of the houses." Thus Westminster had the honour to begin the innovation, by procuring an act with ample powers to improve the pavement, &c., of the streets; and this act also sealed the doom of the sign-attempt had been made in Paris at numbering sixty-eight new houses, built in that year on the Pont Nôtre-Dame, which were all distinguished by 1, 2, 3, 4, &c. ; yet more than two centuries elapsed before the numerical arrangement was generally adopted. In 1787 the custom in France had become almost universal, but was not enforced by police regulations until 1805. In London it appears to have been attempted in the beginning of the eighteenth century ; for in Hatton's "New View of London," 1708, we see that "in Prescott Street, Goodman's Fields, instead of signs the houses are distinguished by numbers, as the staircases in the Inns of Court and Chancery." In all probability reading was not sufficiently widespread at that time to bring this novelty into general practice. Yet how much more simple is the method of numbering, for giving a clear and unmistakable direction, may be seen from the means resorted to to indicate a house under the signboard system ; as for instance :—

* For a full account of the "Exhibition," see in the Supplement at the end of this work.

"TO BE LETT, Newbury House, in St James's Park, next door but one to Lady Oxford's, having two balls at the gate, and iron rails before the door," &c., &c.—Advertisement in the original edition of the Spectator, No. 207.

"AT HER HOUSE, the RED BALL AND ACORN, over against the GLOBE Tavern, in Queen Street, Cheapside, near the THREE CROWNS, liveth a Gentlewoman," &c.

At night the difficulty of finding a house was greatly increased, for the light of the lamps was so faint that the signs, generally hung rather high, could scarcely be discerned. Other means, therefore, were resorted to, as we see from the advertisement of "Doctor James Tilbrogh, a German Doctor," who resides "over against the New Exchange in Bedford Street, at the sign of the Peacock, where you shall see at night two candles burning within one of the chambers before the balcony, and a lanthorn with a candle in it upon the balcony." And in that strain all directions were given : over against, or next door to, were among the consecrated formulæ. Hence many dispensed with a picture of their own, and clung, like parasites, to the sign opposite or next door, particularly if it was a shop of some note. Others resorted to painting their houses, doors, balconies, or doorposts, in some striking colour ; hence those Red, Blue, or White Houses still so common ; hence also the Blue Posts and the Green Posts. So we find a Dark House in Chequer Alley, Moorfields, a Green Door in Craven Building, and a Blue Balcony in Little Queen Street, all of which figure on the seventeenth century trades before their shops, expressly adding this clause in large capitals, that 'they are genuine descendants of the renowned and matchless Grasshopper of Mr E—— in Cheapside.'"*

Such practices as these, however, necessarily gave the deathblow to signboards ; for, by reason of this imitation on the part of rival shopkeepers, the main object—distinction and notoriety—was lost. How was a stranger to know which of those innumerable Beehives in the Strand was the Beehive ; or which of all those "genuine Grasshoppers" was THE genuine one ? So, gradually, the signs began to dwindle away, first in the principal streets, then in the smaller thoroughfares and the suburbs ; finally, in the provincial towns also. The publicans only retained them, and even they in the end were satisfied with the name without the sign, vox et præterea nihil.

In the seventeenth century signs had been sung in sprightly ballads, and often given the groundwork for a biting satire. They continued to inspire the popular Muse until the end, but her latter productions were more like a wail than a ballad. There is certainly a rollicking air of gladness about the following song, but it was the last flicker of the lamp :—

"THE MAIL-COACH GUARD.

At each inn on the road I a welcome could find :—

At the Fleece I'd my skin full of ale ;

The Two Jolly Brewers were just to my mind ;

At the Dolphin I drank like a whale.

Tom Tun at the Hogshead sold pretty good stuff ;

They'd capital flip at the Boar ;

And when at the Angel I'd tippled enough,

I went to the Devil for more.

Then I'd always a sweetheart so snug at the Car ;

At the Rose I'd a lily so white ;

Few planets could equal sweet Nan at the Star,

No eyes ever twinkled so bright.

I've had many a hug at the sign of the Bear ;

In the Sun courted morning and noon ;

And when night put an end to my happiness there,

I'd a sweet little girl in the Moon.

To sweethearts and ale I at length bid adieu,

Of wedlock to set up the sign :

Hand-in-hand the Good Woman I look for in you,

And the Horns I hope ne'er will be mine.

Once guard to the mail, I'm now guard to the fair ;

But though my commission 's laid down,

Yet while the King's Arms I'm permitted to bear,

Like a Lion I'll fight for the Crown."

* Memorials of Nature and Art collected on a Journey in Great Britain during the Years 1802 and 1803. By C. A. G. Goede. London, 1808. Vol. i. p. 68.

1

There's The Hare and Hounds that never did run,
And many's been hung for the deeds they've done.

There are Two Fighting Cocks that never did crow,
Where men often meet to break God's holy vow;
There is The New Inn, and the Rodney they say,
Which send men to jail their debts for to pay.

The Hope and The Anchor, The Turk and his Head,
Hundreds they've caused for to wander for bread;
There is The White Horse, also The Woolpack,
Take the shoes off your feet, and the clothes off your back.

The Axe and the Cleaver, The Jockey and Horse,
Some they've made idle, some they've made worse;
The George and the Dragon, and Nelson the brave,
Many lives they've shorten'd and brought to the grave.

The Fox and the Goose, and The Guns put across,
But all the craft is to get hold of the brass;
The Bird in the Cage, and the sign of The Thrush,
But one in the hand is worth two in the bush."

There is an unpleasant musty air about this ballad, a taint of Seven Dials, an odour of the ragged dresscoat, and the broken, ill-used hat. The gay days of signboard poetry, when sparks in feathers and ruffles sang their praises, are no more. Our forefathers were content to buy "at the Golden Frying-pan," but we must needs go to somebody's emporium, mart, repository, or make our purchases at such grand places as the Pantocapelleion, Pantometallurgicon, or Panklibanon. The corruptions and misapplications of the old pictorial signboards find a parallel in the modern rendering of our ancient proverbs and sayings. When the primary use and purpose of an article have fallen out of fashion, or become obsolete, there is no knowing how absurdly it may not be treated by succeeding generations. We were once taken many miles over fields and through lanes to see the great stone coffins of some ancient Romans, but the farmer, a sulky man, thought we were impertinent in wishing to see his pig-troughs. In Haarem, we were once shewn the huge cannon-ball which killed Heemskerk, the discoverer of Nova Zembla. When not required for exhibition, however, the good man in charge found it of great use in grinding his mustard-seed. Amongst the middle classes of to-day, no institution of ancient times has been more corrupted and misapplied than heraldry. The modern "Forrester," or member of the "Ancient Order of Druids," is scarcely a greater burlesque upon the original than the beer-retailers' "Arms" of the present hour.

"In ludicrous things, a barber will write under his sign :—

'La Nature donne barbe et cheveux,
Et moi, je les coupe tous les deux.'*

'A toutes les figures dédiant mes rasoirs,
Je nargue la censure des fidèles miroirs.'†

"Also a frequent inscription with a barber is, 'Ici on rajeunit.' A breeches-maker writes up, M—, Culottier de Mme. la Duchesse de Devonshire. A perruquier exhibits a sign, very well painted, of an old fop trying on a new wig, entitled, Au ci-devant jeune homme. A butcher displays a bouquet of faded flowers, with this inscription, Au tendre Souvenir. An eating-house exhibits a punning sign, with an ox dressed up with bonnet, lace veil, shawl, &c., which naturally implies, Bœuf à-la-mode. A pastry-cook has a very pretty little girl climbing up to reach some cakes in a cupboard, and this sign he calls, A la petite Gourmande. A stocking-maker has painted for him a lovely creature, trying on a new stocking, at the same time exhibiting more charms than the occasion requires to the young fellow who is on his knees at her feet, with the very significant motto, A la belle occasion."‡

Though it is forty years since these remarks were written, they still, mutatis mutandis, apply to the present day. Even the greatest and most fashionable shops on the Boulevards have their names or painted signs; the subjects are mostly taken from the principal topic of conversation at the time the establishment opened, whether politics, literature, the drama, or fine arts: thus we have à la Présidence; au Prophète; au Palais d'Industrie; aux Enfants d'Edouard, (the Princes in the Tower); au Colosse de Rhodes; à la Tour de Malakoff; à la Tour de Nesles, (tragedy); au Sonneur de St Paul, (tragedy); à la Dame Blanche; à la Bataille de Solferino; au Trois Mousquetaires; au Lingot d'Or, (a great lottery swindle in 1852); à la Reine Blanche, &c.§ Some of these signs are remarkably well painted, in a vigorous, bold style, with great bravura of brush; for instance, les Noces de Vulcain, on the Quai aux Fleurs, is painted in a style which would do no discredit to the artist of les Romains de la Décadence. Roger Bontemps is still frequent

* "Nature provides man with hair and beard,
But I cut them both."

† "I devote my razors to all faces,
And defy the criticism of faithful mirrors."

‡ A sort of pun, "la belle occasion" implying the same idea that our shopkeepers express by their "Now is your time," and similar puffs.

§ Similar instances may also be occasionally met with in London; for instance, the Corsican Brothers, (Coffee-house, Fulham Road.)

other signs in the street, the painter having shewn a masterly judgment, and the carver and gilder much pomp and splendour. It looked rather like a capital picture in a gallery than a sign in the street."

Unfortunately the name of the artist who painted this has not come down to us.

Those who produced the best signs, however, were not exactly the Harp Alley sign-painters, but the coach-painters, who often united these two branches of art. In the last century, both the coaches and sedans of the wealthy classes were walking picture galleries, the panels being painted with all sorts of subjects.* And when the men that painted these turned their hands to sign-painting, they were sure to produce something good. Such was Clarkson, to whom J. T. Smith ascribed the beautiful sign of Shakespeare that formerly hung in Little Russell Street, Drury Lane, for which he was paid £500.—John Baker, (ob. 1771,) who studied under the same master as Catton, and was made a member of the Royal Academy at its foundation.—Charles Catton (ob. 1798) painted several very good signs, particularly a Lion for his friend Wright, a famous coachmaker, at that time living in Long Acre. This picture, though it had weathered many a storm, was still to be seen in J. T. Smith's time, at a coachmaker's on the west side of Well Street, Oxford Street. A Turk's head, painted by him, was long admired as the sign of a mercer in York Street, Covent Garden.—John Baptist Cipriani, (ob. 1785,) a Florentine carriage-painter, living in London, also a Royal Academician.—Samuel Wale, R.A. (ob. 1786) painted a celebrated Falstaff and various other signs; the principal one was a whole length of Shakespeare, about five feet high, which was executed for and displayed at the door of a public-house at the north-west corner of Little Russell Street, Drury Lane. It was enclosed in a most sumptuous carved gilt frame, and was suspended by rich ironwork. But this splendid object of attraction did not hang long before it was taken down, in consequence of the Act of Parliament for removing the signs and other obstructions in the streets of London. Such was the change in the public appreciation consequent on the new regulations in signs, that this representation of our great dramatic poet was sold for a trifle to Mason the broker in Lower Grosvenor Street, where it stood at his door for several years, until it was totally destroyed by the weather and other accidents.†

* Two or three good examples are to be seen in the South Kensington Museum.

† Edwards's Anecdotes of Painters, 1808, p. 117.

The universal use of signboards furnished no little employment for the inferior rank of painters, and sometimes even to the superior professors. Among the most celebrated practitioners in this branch was a person of the name of Lamb, who possessed considerable ability. His pencil was bold and masterly, and well adapted to the subjects on which it was generally employed. There was also Gwynne, another coach-painter, who acquired some reputation as a marine painter, and produced a few good signs. Robert Dalton, keeper of the pictures of King George III., had been apprenticed to a sign and coach-painter; so were Ralph Kirby, drawing-master to George IV. when Prince of Wales, Thomas Wright of Liverpool, the marine painter, Smirke, R.A., and many artists who acquired considerable after-reputation.

Peter Monamy (ob. 1749) was apprenticed to a sign and house-painter on London Bridge. It was this artist who decorated the carriage of Admiral Byng with ships and naval trophies, and painted a portrait of Admiral Vernon's ship for a famous public-house of the day, well known by the sign of the Portobello, a few doors north of the church in St Martin's Lane.*

Besides these, we have the "great professors," as Edwards calls them, who occasionally painted a sign for a freak. At the head of these stands Hogarth, whose Man loaded with Mischief is still to be seen at 414 Oxford Street, where it is a fixture in the alehouse of that name.

Richard Wilson, R.A., (ob. 1782,) painted the Three Loggerheads for an alehouse in North Wales, which gave its name to the village of Loggerheads, near the town of Mould. The painting was still exhibited as a signboard in 1824, though little of Wilson's work remained, as it had been repeatedly touched up.

George Morland painted several; the Goat in Boots on the Fulham Road is attributed to him, but has since been painted often over; he also painted a White Lion for an inn at Paddington, where he used to carouse with his boon companions, Ibbetson and Rathbone; and in a small public-house near Chelsea Bridge, Surrey, there was, as late as 1824, a sign of the Cricketers painted by him. This painting by Morland, at the date mentioned, had been removed inside the house, and a copy of it hung up for the sign; unfortunately, however, the landlord used to travel about with the original, and put it up before his booth at Staines and Egham races, cricket matches, and similar occasions.

* J. T. Smith's Nollekens and his Times, vol. I. p. 26

Ibbetson painted a sign for the village alehouse at Troutbeck, near Ambleside, to settle a bill run up in a sketching, fishing, and dolce-far-niente expedition ; the sign represented two faces, the one thin and pale, the other jolly and rubicund ; under it was the following rhyme :—

“Thou mortal man that liv’st by bread,
What made thy face to look so red?
Thou silly fop, that looks so pale,
’Tis red with Tommy Burkett’s ale.” *

David Cox painted a Royal Oak for the alehouse at Bettws-y-Coed, Denbighshire ; fortunately this has been taken down, and is now preserved behind glass inside the inn.

The elder Crome produced a sign of the Sawyers at St Martins, Norwich ; it was afterwards taken down by the owner, framed, and hung up as a picture.

At New Inn Lane, Epsom, Harlow painted a front and a back view of Queen Charlotte, to settle a bill he had run up ; he imitated Sir Thomas Lawrence’s style, and signed it “T. L.,” Greek Street, Soho. When Lawrence heard this, he got in a terrible rage and said, if Harlow were not a scoundrel, he would kick him from one street’s end to the other ; upon which Harlow very coolly remarked, that when Sir Thomas should make up his mind to it, he hoped he would choose a short street.

In his younger days Sir Charles Ross painted a sign of the Magpie at Sudbury, and the landlady of the house, with no small pride, gave the informant to understand that, more than thirty years after, the aristocratic portrait-painter came in a carriage to her house, and asked to be shewn the old sign once more.

Herring is said to have painted some signs. Amongst them are the Flying Dutchman, at Cottage Green, Camberwell, and a White Lion at Doncaster ; underneath the last are the words,—“Painted by Herring.”

Millais painted a Saint George and Dragon, with grapes round it, for the Vidler’s Inn, Hayes, Kent ; and we learn that a sign at Singleton, Lancashire, was painted by an R.A. and an R.S., each painting one side of it ; on the front was represented a wearied pilgrim, at the back the same refreshed, but the sign was never hung up.

Great men of former ages, also, are known to have painted signs ; in the museum at Basle, in Switzerland, there are two pictures of a school, painted by Holbein when fourteen years old, for a sign of the schoolmaster of the town. The Mule and Muleteer in the Sutherland collection, is said to have been painted by Correggio as a sign for an inn; a similar legend is told about the Young Bull of Paul Potter, in the museum of the Hague, in Holland, which is reported to have been painted for a butcher's signboard. The Chaste Susannah (la chaste Susanne) was formerly a fine stone bas-relief in the Rue aux Fèves, Paris; it was attributed to Goujon, and bought as such by an amateur. A plaster cast of it now occupies its place. Watteau executed a sign for a milliner on the Pont Nôtre-Dame, which was thought sufficiently good to be engraved. Horace Vernet has the name of having produced some signs in his younger days; and there is still at the present time a sign of the White Horse, in one of the villages in the neighbourhood of Paris, which is pointed out as a work of Guéricault.

* Tommy Burkett was the name of mine host. The painting is now gone, but the verses remain.

Besides these, there are, and have been at various times, excellent signboards in Paris, the artists of which are not known. Thus there was, in the beginning of the eighteenth century, a sign at the foot of the Pont Neuf, called le Petit Dunkerque, which was greatly admired; and in the reign of Louis XV. an armourer on the Pont Saint Michel had a sign, which was so fine a work of art that it was bought as a cabinet picture by a wealthy citizen. In the beginning of this century there was a much admired sign on the shutters of a glass and china shop in the Rue Royale St Honoré, which unfortunately was destroyed during some repairs that took place upon the building passing into other hands. In 1808, the sign of la Fille mal gardée, (a vaudeville,) at a mercer's, attracted great attention. About this period the Rue Vivienne was very rich in good signboards; there were la Toison de Cachemire; les Trois Sultanes; le Couronnement de la Rosière, and la Joconde, all very good works of art. There was a gay Comte Ory on the Boulevard des Italiens, and la Blanche Marguerite, most comely to look upon, in the Rue Montmartre. All these are now gone, but many good specimens of French signboard painting may yet be met with.

Before closing this general survey of signboard history, we must direct attention to the number of streets named after signs, both in England and abroad. A walk down Fleet Street will give, in a small compass, as many illustrations as are to be met with in any other thoroughfare in town, for there nearly all the courts are named after signs that were either hung within them, or at their entrance. Not only streets, but families also have to thank signs for their names.

"Many names that seem unfitting for men, as of brutish beasts, etc., come from the very signs of the houses where they inhabited; for I have heard of them which sayd they spake of knowledge, that some in late time dwelling at the signe of the Dolphin, Bull, White Horse, Racket, Peacocke, etc., were commonly called Thomas at the Dolphin, Will at the Bull, George at the White Horse, Robin at the Racket, which names, as many other of like sort, with omitting at the, became afterwards hereditary to their children."—CAMDEN'S Remaines, p. 102.

As examples of such names we have, "Arrow, Axe, Barrell, Bullhead, Bell, Block, Board, Banner, Bowles, Baskett, Cann, Coulter, Chisell, Clogg, Crosskeys, Crosier, Funnell, Forge, Firebrand, Grapes, Griffin, Horns, Hammer, Hamper, Hodd, Harrow, Image, (the sign originally in honour of some saint perhaps,) Jugg, Kettle, Knife, Lance, Mallet, Maul, Mattock, Needle, Pail, Pott, Potts, Plowe, Plane, Pipes, Pottle, Patten, Posnet, (a purse or money-bag,) Pitcher, Rule, Rainbow, Sack, Saw, Shovel, Shears, Scales, Silverspoon, Swords, Tankard, Tabor, (a drum,) Trowel, Tubb and Wedge, and a good many others." *

And now, having taken a passing glance at signboard history, from the earliest times down to the present day, we may not improperly conclude this chapter with an enumeration of the inn, tavern, and public-house signs which occur most frequently in London, in this present year of grace, 1864 :—

12 Adam and Eves, 13 Albions, 5 Alfred's Heads, 13 Anchor and Hopes, 18 Angels, 8 Angels and Crowns, 3 Antigallicans, 5 Artichokes, 13 Barley Mows, 9 Beehives, 31 Bells, 7 Ben Jonsons, 5 Birds in Hand, 5 Black Boys, 16 Black Bulls, 5 Black Dogs, 29 Black Horses, 10 Black Lions, 6 Black Swans, 19 Blue Anchors, 5 Blue Coat Boys, 6 Blue Lasts, 14 Blue Peters, 27 Bricklayers' Arms, 5 Bridge Houses, 22 Britannias, 15 Brown Bears, 8 Builders' Arms, 17 Bulls, (some combined with Bells, Butchers, &c.,) 22 Bull's Heads, 4 Camden Heads, 6 Capes of Good Hope, 14 Carpenters' Arms, 19 Castles, 6 Catherine Wheels, 7 Champions, 5 Chequers, 5 Cherry-trees, 8 Cheshire Cheeses, 11 City Arms, 18 Cities of London, and other cities, (as Canton, Paris, Quebec, &c.,) 52 Coach and Horses, 12 Cocks, 16 Cocks in combination with Bottles, Hoops, Lions, Magpies, &c., 6 Constitutions, 17

* M. A. Lower's Essay on Family Nomenclature, vol. i. p. 201.

Coopers' Arms, 7 Crooked Billets, 5 Cross Keys, 61 Crowns, 18 Crown and Anchors, 5 Crown and Cushions, 11 Crown and Sceptres, 17 Crowns, combined with other objects, as Anvils, Barley Mows, Thistles, Dolphins, &c., (in all, 112 Crowns; certainly we are a loyal nation!) 12 Devonshire Arms, 2 Devonshire Castles, 10 Dolphins, 6 Dover Castles, 34 Dukes of Wellington, 32 Dukes of York, 6 Dukes of Sussex, 16 Dukes of Clarence, 7 Dukes of Cambridge, 26 other Dukes, (including Albemarle, Argyle, Bedford, Bridgewater, Gloucester, &c.,) 7 various Duchesses, (as Kent, York, Oldenburgh, &c.,) 14 Duke's Heads, 18 Earls, (Aberdeen, Cathcart, Chatham, Durham, Essex, &c.,) 6 Edinburgh Castles, 5 Elephants and Castles, 9 Falcons, 21 Feathers, 4 Fishmongers' Arms, 4 Five Bells, 5 Fleeces, 6 Flying Horses, 5 Fortunes of War, 24 Fountains, 8 Foxes, 12 Foxes, combined with Grapes, Hounds, Geese, &c., 8 Freemasons' Arms, 8 various Generals, (Elliott, Hill, Abercrombie, Picton, Wolfe, &c.,) 52 Georges, 14 George and Dragons, 19 George the Fourth's, 31 Globes, 6 Gloster Arms, 7 Goats, 5 Golden Anchors, 5 Golden Fleeces, 15 Golden Lions, 6 Goldsmith's Arms, 56 Grapes, 15 Green Dragons, 4 Green Gates, 24 Green Men, 9 Greyhounds, 7 Griffins, 5 Grosvenor Arms, 8 Guns, 4 Guy of Warwicks, 6 Half-moons, 4 Hercules, 2 Hercules Pillars, 5 Holes in the Wall, 5 Hoop and Grapes, 4 Hop-poles, 12 Hopes, 11 Horns, 21 Horses and Grooms, 7 Horseshoes, 5 Horseshoe and Magpies, 6 Jacob's Wells, 5 John Bulls, 16 various "Jolly" people, as Jolly Anglers, Caulkers, Gardeners, &c., 12 Kings of Prussia, 10 Kings and Queens, 89 King's Arms, 63 King's Heads, (loyalty again!) 8 Lambs, 3 Lambs and Flags, 4 Lion and Lambs, 55 different Lords, amongst which, 23 Lord Nelsons, 4 Magpie and Stumps, 3 Mail-coaches, 3 Men in the Moon, 2 Marlborough Arms, 6 Marlborough Heads, 18 Marquis of Granbys, 6 Marquis of Cornwallises, 14 various Marquises, 9 Masons' Arms, 17 Mitres, 4 Mulberry-trees, 15 Nag's Heads, 3 Nell Gwynns, 7 Noah's Arks, 7 Norfolk Arms, 4 North Poles, 9 Northumberland Arms, 3 Old Parr's Heads, 6 Olive Branches, 6 Oxford Arms, 10 Peacocks, (1 Peahen,) 5 Perseverances, 5 Pewter Platters, 10 Phoenixes, 3 Pied Bulls, 5 Pine Apples, 9 Pitt's Heads, 15 Ploughs, 6 Portland Arms, 5 Portman Arms, 19 Prince Alberts, 5 Prince Alfreds, 3 Prince Arthurs, 15 other Princes, (mostly of the Royal Family,) 43 Princes of Wales, 12 Prince Regents, 6 Princess Royals, 3 Princess Victorias, and a few of the younger Princesses,

2 Punchbowls, 3 Queens, 3 Queen and Prince Alberts, 17 Queen Victorias, 23 Queen's Arms, 49 Queen's Heads, 8 Railway Taverns, 8 Red Cows, 4 Red Crosses, 73 Red Lions, 26 Rising Suns, 9 Robin Hoods, 5 Rodney Heads, 10 Roebucks, 14 Roses, 48 Rose and Crowns, 4 Royal Alberts, 28 various Royal personages and objects, as Champions, Cricketers, Crowns, Dukes, Forts, &c., 8 Royal Georges, 26 Royal Oaks, 13 Royal Standards, 7 Running Horses, 23 Saints, (3 Saint Andrews, 4 St Georges, 3 St Jameses, 3 St Johns, 2 St Luke's Heads, 2 St Martins, 2 St Pauls, &c.,) 5 Salisbury Arms, 2 Salmons, 4 Salutations, 6 Scotch Stores, 4 Seven Stars, 8 Shakespeare Heads, 2 Shepherds and Flocks, 2 Shepherds and Shepherdesses, 53 Ships, (23 in combination, on launch, aground, &c.,) 3 Ship and Stars, 2 Ships and Whales, 19 Sirs, (including 4 Falstaffs, Sir John Barleycorn, Middleton, Newton, Wren, Abercrombie, Pindar, Peel, Raleigh, Walworth, &c.,) 5 Skinners' Arms, 4 Southampton Arms, 4 Sportsmen, 3 Spotted Dogs, 14 Spread Eagles, 3 Stags, 3 Staghounds, 11 Stars, 17 Star and Garters, 8 Sugar-loaves, 19 Suns, 19 Swans, 9 Talbots, 4 Telegraphs, 3 Thatched Houses, 5 Thistles and Crowns, 21 Three Compasses, 8 Three Crowns, 3 Three Cranes, 3 Three Cups, 3 Three Kings, 19 Three Tuns, 8 Tigers, (1 Tiger Cat,) 10 Turk's Heads, 28 Two Brewers, 5 Two Chairmen, 4 Unicorns, 10 Unions, 2 Union Flags, 11 Victories, 5 Vines, 3 Waggon and Horses, 10 Watermen's Arms, 9 Weavers' Arms, 3 Westminster Arms, 20 Wheat Sheaves, 15 White Bears, 63 White Harts, 44 White Horses, 25 White Lions, 35 White Swans, 3 Whittington and Cats, (1 Whittington and Stone,) 16 William the Fourths, 11 Windmills, 12 Windsor Castles, 4 Woodmen, 8 Woolpacks, 10 York Arms and York Minster, 12 Yorkshire Greys.

CHAPTER II.

HISTORIC AND COMMEMORATIVE SIGNS.

THE Greeks honoured their great men and successful commanders by erecting statues to them; the Romans rewarded their popular favourites with triumphal entries and ovations; modern nations make the portraits of their celebrities serve as signs for public-houses.

"Vernon, the Butcher Cumberland, Wolfe, Hawke,
Prince Ferdinand, Granby, Burgoyne, Keppel, Howe,
Evil and good have had their tithe of talk,
And fill'd their signpost then, like Wellesley now."

As Byron hints, popular admiration is generally very short-lived; and when a fresh hero is gazetted, the next new alehouse will most probably adopt him for a sign in preference to the last great man. Thus it is that even the Duke of Wellington is now neglected, and in his place we see General Havelock, Sir Colin Campbell, Lord Palmerston, and Mr Gladstone, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, not omitting the fair Princess of Denmark. We will not now dwell upon these modern celebrities, but rather direct our attention to those illustrious dead upon whom the signboard honours were bestowed in bygone ages.

Many signboards have an historic connexion of some sort with the place where they are exhibited. Thus the ALFRED'S HEAD, at Wantage, in Berkshire, was in all probability chosen as a sign because Wantage was the birthplace of King Alfred. So the CANUTE CASTLE, at Southampton, owes its existence to a local tradition; whilst admiration for the great Scotch patriot made an innkeeper in Stowell Street, Newcastle, adopt SIR WILLIAM WALLACE'S ARMS. The CÆSAR'S HEAD was, in 1761, to be seen near the New Church in the Strand,* and, in the beginning of this century, was the sign of a tavern in Soho, which afterwards removed to Great Palace Yard, Westminster. Even at the present day, his head may be seen outside certain village alehouses; but this we may attribute to that provincial popularity which the Roman hero shares with Oliver Cromwell; for as the Protector gets the blame of having made nearly all the ruins which are to be found in the three kingdoms, so Cæsar is generally named by country people as the builder of every old wall or earthwork the origin of which is unknown.

* Lloyd's Evening Post, February 11-13, 1761.

Notwithstanding the popular censure, CROMWELL is still honoured with signboards in places where his memory has lingered, as at Kate's Hill, near Dudley.

In most cases, however, signboard popularity is rather short-lived; "dulcique animos novitate tenebo" seems to be essentially the motto of those that choose popular characters for their sign. Had this modern tribute of admiration been in use at the time of the Preacher, it might have afforded him one more illustration of the vanity of vanities to be found in all sublunary things. Horace Walpole noticed this fickleness of signboard fame in one of his letters:—

"I was yesterday out of town, and the very signs, as I passed through the villages, made me make very quaint reflections on the mortality of fame and popularity. I observed how the Duke's Head had succeeded almost universally to Admiral Vernon's, as his had left but few traces of the Duke of Ormond's. I pondered these things in my breast, and said to myself, 'Surely all glory is but as a sign!'"*

Some favourites of the signboard have, however, been more fortunate than others. HENRY VIII., for instance, may still be seen in many places; indeed, for more than two centuries after his death, almost every KING'S HEAD invariably gave a portrait of Bluff Harry.

Older kings occasionally occur, but their memories seem to have been revived rather than handed down by successive inn-keepers. If we are to believe an old Chester legend, however, THE KING EDGAR INN, in Bridge Street of that city, has existed by the same name since the time of the Saxon king. The sign represents King Edgar rowed down the river Dee by the eight tributary kings. The present house has the appearance of being built anterior to the reign of Elizabeth, and the sign looks almost as old, but it would be unwise to give the place or the sign a much higher antiquity. KING JOHN is the sign under whose auspices Jem Mace, the pugilist, keeps a public-house in Holywell Lane, Shoreditch. The same king also figures in Albemarle Street and in Bermondsey; whilst the great event of his reign, MAGNA CHARTA, is a sign at New Holland, Hull. JOHN OF GAUNT may be seen in many places; and we may surmise that his upholders are stanch Protestants, who value his character as a reformer and supporter of Wicliffe. The BLACK PRINCE may not unlikely have come down to us in an uninterrupted line of signboards; so little was his identity sometimes understood, that there is a shop-bill in the "Banks Collection" * on which this hero is represented as a negro!

* Horace Walpole's Letters. Thirteenth Letter to Mr Conway. April 16, 1747.

There is a QUEEN ELEANOR in London Fields, Hackney, probably the beautiful and affectionate queen of Edward I., buried in Westminster Abbey, 1290, in honour of whom Charing Cross, Cheapcross, and seven other crosses, were erected on the places where her body rested on its way to the great Abbey. What prompted the choice of this sign it is hard to say.

At Hever, in Kent, a rude portrait of Henry VIII. may be seen. Near this village the Bolleyn or Bullen family formerly held large possessions; and old people in the district yet shew the spot where, as the story goes, King Henry often used to meet Sir Thomas Bolleyn's daughter Anne. Be this as it may, years after the unhappy death of Anne, the village alehouse had for its sign, BULLEN BUTCHERED; but the place falling into new hands, the name of the house was altered to the BULL AND BUTCHER, which sign existed to a recent date, and would probably have swung at this moment, but for a desire of the resident clergyman to see something different. He suggested the KING'S HEAD; and the village painter was forthwith commissioned to make the alteration. The latter accepted the task, drew the bluff features of the monarch, and represented it as other King's Heads, but in his hands placed a large axe, which signboard exists to this day.

As for QUEEN ELIZABETH, she was the constant type of the Queen's Head, as her father was of the King's Head; and, like him, she may still be seen in many places. It is somewhat more difficult to ascertain who is meant by the QUEEN CATHERINE in Brook Street, Ratcliffe Highway; whether it be Queen Catherine of Aragon, or Queen Catherine of Braganza. QUEEN ANNE, in South Street, Walworth, has evidently come down to us as the token of that house since the day of its opening, just as the QUEEN OF BOHEMIA, who, until about fifty years ago, continued as a sign in Drury Lane. † This was Elizabeth, daughter of James I., married to Frederic V., Elector-Palatine, who, after her husband's death, lived at Craven House, Drury Lane, and died there, February 13, 1661, having been privately married, it is thought, to Lord Craven, who was foremost in fighting the battles of her husband.

Of KING'S HEADS, Henry VIII. is the oldest on authentic re-

* In the Print-room of the British Museum.

† Pennant's History of London, vol. 1. p. 99.

cord. But this does not prove that he was the first ; for, as there lived great men before Agamemnon, so most kings during their reign will, in all probability, have had their signs. Among Henry's successors, we find the head of Edward VI. on a trades token ; whilst CHARLES THE FIRST'S HEAD was the portrait hanging from the house of that scoundrel Jonathan Wild, in the Old Bailey. Even at the present day there is a sign of CHARLES THE FIRST at Goring Heath, Reading. The MARTYR'S HEAD in Smithfield, 1710, seems also to have been a portrait of Charles I. ; so, at least, the following allusion gives us to understand :—

"May Hyde, near Smithfield, at the Martyr's Head,
Who charms the nicest judge with noble red,
Thrive on by drawing wines, which none can blame,
But those who in his sign behold their shame ;" *

which seems to be an allusion to Puritanical water-drinkers. To this unfortunate king belongs also the sign of the MOURNING BUSH, set up by Taylor the water-poet over his tavern in Phoenix Alley, Long Acre, to express his grief at the beheading of Charles I. ; but he was soon compelled to take it down, when he put up the POET'S HEAD, his own portrait, with this inscription :—

"There is many a head hangs for a sign ;
Then, gentle reader, why not mine ?"

This "Poeta Aquaticus," as he sometimes called himself, was a boatman on the Thames, and alehouse-keeper by profession, besides being the author of fourscore books of very original poetry. At the same time that he put up his new sign of the Poet's Head, he issued a rhyming pamphlet, in which occur the following lines :—

"My signe was once a Crowne, but now it is Changed by a sudden metamorphosis.
The crowne was taken downe, and in the stead
Is placed John Taylor's, or the Poet's Head.
A painter did my picture gratis make,
And (for a signe) I hang'd it for his sake.
Now, if my picture's drawing can prevayle,
'Twill draw my friends to me, and I'll draw ale.
Two strings are better to a bow than one ;
And poeting does me small good alone.
So ale alone yields but small good to me,
Except it have some spice of poesie.
The fruits of ale are unto drunkards such,
To make 'em sweare and lye that drinke too much.
But my ale, being drunk with moderation,

* "The Quack Vintners, 1710," a tract written against Brooke and Hilliers, the famous wine-merchants of that time, frequently mentioned by the Spectator.

PLATE IV.

EAGLE AND CHILD.
(Banks's Bills, circa 1790.)

ROBIN HOOD AND LITTLE JOHN.
(Roxburghe Ballads, 1690.)

GRIFFIN AND CHAIR.
(Banks's Bills, 1790.)

BOLT-IN-TUN.
(Fleet Street.)

BOAR'S HEAD.
(Eastcheap.)

BULL'S HEAD.
(Loughborough, Linc., 1696.)

London ; tokens of some half a dozen houses bearing that sign are extant. What is rather curious is that, not many years since, one of the descendants of trusty Dick Pendrell kept an inn at Lewes, in Sussex, called the Royal Oak.

There is a trades token of "William Hagley, at the RESTORATION, in St George's Fields ;" but how this event was represented does not appear. At Charing Cross it was commemorated by the sign of the PAGEANT Tavern, which represented the triumphal arch erected at that place on occasion of the entry of Charles II., and which remained standing for a year after. This was evidently the same house which Pepys calls the TRIUMPH. It seems to have been a fashionable place, for he went there, on the 25th May 1662, to see the Portuguese ladies of Queen Catherine. "They are not handsome," says he, "and their fardingales a strange dress. Many ladies and persons of quality come to see them. I find nothing in them that is pleasing ; and I see they have learned to kiss and look freely up and down already, and, I believe, will soon forget the recluse practice of their own country. They complain much for lack of good water to drink." The Triumph is still the sign of a public-house in Skinner Street, Somers Town.

QUEEN MARY was in her day a very popular sign, as may be gathered from many of the shop-bills in the Banks Collection ; whilst WILLIAM AND MARY are still to be seen in Maiden Causeway, Cambridge. The accession of the house of Brunswick produced the BRUNSWICK, still very common, particularly in the West Riding of Yorkshire. Then come the Georges, of whom GEORGE III. and GEORGE IV. still survive in nearly as many instances as their successor, WILLIAM IV. ; with them a few of the royal Dukes of CLARENCE, SUFFOLK, and, above all, "the Butcher CUMBERLAND ;" until at length we come to PRINCESS VICTORIA, and, finally, the QUEEN VICTORIA, the BRITISH QUEEN, ISLAND QUEEN, &c. Under one of her signs at Coopersale, in Essex, is the following inscription :—

"The Queen some day
May pass this way,
And see our Tom and Jerry.
Perhaps she'll stop,
And stand a drop,
To make her subjects merry."

Among the foreign kings and potentates who have figured in our open-air walhalla, the Turkish sultans seem to have stood foremost. MORAT (Amurat) and SOLIMAN were constant coffee-house signs in the seventeenth century. Trades tokens are extant, in the Beaufoy and other collections, of a coffee-house in Exchange Alley, the sign of Morat, with this distich:—

"MORAT . Y^e . GREAT . MEN . DID . MEE . CALL WHERE . ERE . I . CAME . I . CONQUER'D . ALL."

On the reverse: "Coffee, tobacco, sherbett, tea, and chocolat retai'd in Exchange Alley." The same house figures in advertisements of the time, giving the prices of those various articles:—

"AT THE COFFEE-HOUSE in Exchange Alley is sold by Retail the right Coffee-powder, from 4s. to 6s. per pound, as in goodness; that pounded in a mortar at 3s. per pound; also that termed the right Turkie Berry, well garbled, at 3s. per pound—the ungarbled for less; that termed the East India Berry at 20d. per pound, with directions gratis how to make and use the same. Likewise, there you may have Tobacco, Verinas and Virginia, Chocolatta—the ordinary pound-boxes at 2s. per pound; also Sherbets (made in Turkie) of Lemons, Roses, and Violets perfumed; and Tea according to its goodness, from 6s. to 60s. per pound. For all of which, if any Gentleman shall write or send, they shall be sure of the best as they shall order; and to avoid deceit, warranted under the House Seal—viz., MORAT THE GREAT," &c.—Mercurius Publicus, March 12–19, 1662.

The GREAT MOGOL also had his share of signboards, of which a few still survive; one, for instance, in New Bartholomew Street, Birmingham. KOULI KHAN we find only in one instance, (though there were probably many more,) namely, on the sign of a tavern by the Quayside, Newcastle, in 1746.* This house had formerly been called the Crown, but changed its sign in honour of Thomas Nadir Shah, or Kouli Khan, who, from having been chief of a band of robbers, at last sat himself on the throne of Persia. He was killed in 1747. One of the reasons of his popularity in this country was the permission he granted to the English nation to trade with Persia, the most chimerical ideas being entertained of the advantages to be derived from that commerce. Hanway, the philanthropist, was for some time concerned in it, but died before he could carry out the scheme; ultimately, the death of Nadir Shah himself put an end to it.

The INDIAN KING, which we meet with so frequently, is an extremely vague personage, which various Indian potentates might take for themselves as the cap fitted. It was generally set up when some king from the far East visited the metropolis, and for a short time created a sensation. Thus, in 1710, there were four Indian kings from "states between New England, New York and Canada," who had audiences with Queen Anne, and seems to have been a good deal talked about. (See Spectator, No. 50.)

* Newcastle Journal, June 28, 1746.

Again, in 1762, London was honoured with the visit of a Cherokee king, and thus many before and after him have created their nine days' wonder.

Visits of European monarchs were also commemorated by complimentary signs. One of the oldest was the KING OF DENMARK, and few kings better than he deserved the exalted place at the alehouse door; yet, such is the ingratitude of the world, that he seems now completely forgotten. The sign originated in the reign of James I., who married a daughter of Christian IV., King of Denmark. In July 1606, the royal father-in-law came over on a visit, when the two kings began "bousing" and carousing right royally, the court, of course, duly following the example. "I came here a day or two before the Danish king came," says Sir John Harrington, "and from that day he did come till this hour, I have been well-nigh overwhelmed with carousal and sport of all kinds. I think the Dane has strangely wrought on our English nobles; for those whom I could never get to taste good liquor, now follow the fashion and wallow in beastly delights. The ladies abandon their society, and are seen to roll about in intoxication," &c.* So late as thirty years ago, not less than three of these signs were left, the most notorious being in the Old Bailey. It used to be open all night for the sale of creature comforts to the drunkard, the thief, the nightwalker, and profiigates of every description. Slang was the language of the place, and doubtless the refreshments were mostly paid for with stolen money. On execution nights, the landlord used to reap a golden harvest; then there were such scenes of drunkenness as must have done the old king on the signboard good to survey, and made him wish to be inside. The visit of another crowned votary of Bacchus is commemorated by the sign of the CZAR'S HEAD, Great Tower Street:—

"Peter the Great and his companions, having finished their day's work, used to resort to a public-house in Great Tower Street, close to Tower Hill, to smoke their pipes and drink beer and brandy. The landlord had the Czar of Muscovy's Head painted, and put it up for his sign, which continued till the year 1808, when a person of the name of Waxel took a fancy to the old sign, and offered the then occupier of the house to paint him a new one for it. A copy was accordingly made of the original, which maintains its station to the present day as the Czar of Muscovy."†

* Nugæ Antiquæ, vol. i. p. 848.

† Barrow's Life of Peter the Great.

The sign is now removed, but the public-house still bears the same name. PRINCE EUGENE also was at one time a popular tavern portrait in England, more particularly after his visit to this country in January 1712. It is named as one of the signs in Norwich in 1750,* but is now, we believe, completely extinct in England; in Paris there is still one surviving on the Boulevard St Martin.

The GRAVE MAURICE is of very old standing in London, being named by Taylor the water-poet as an inn at Knightsbridge in 1636; at present there are two left, one in Whitechapel Road, the other in St Leonard's Road. Who this Grave Maurice was is not quite clear. GRAVE (Ger. Graf, Dutch Graaf, i.e. COUNT.) Maurice of Nassau, afterwards Maurice, Prince of Orange, was, on account of his successful opposition to the Spanish domination in the Netherlands, very popular in this country. In Baker's Chronicles, anno 1612, we read that:—"Upon St Thomas-day, the Paltzgrave and Grave Maurice were elected Knights of the Garter; and the 27th of December, the Paltzgrave was betrothed to the Lady Elizabeth. On Sunday the 7th of February, the Paltzgrave in person was installed a Knight of the Garter at Windsor, and at the same time was Grave Maurice installed by his deputy, Count Lodewick of Nassau." The Garter conferred on the Grave Maurice was that which had been previously worn by Henri Quatre, King of France and Navarre. The Paltzgrave was Grave Maurice's nephew, the Palatine Count Frederick, by whose marriage with King James's daughter were born the brothers Rupert and Maurice, (the latter in 1620,) who distinguished themselves in England during the civil wars. It was this Prince Maurice's great uncle, the Grave Maurice of Nassau, whose counterfeit presentment still gives a name to two of our taverns. Another Maurice, about this period, was very popular in England—viz., Maurice Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, who "carried away the palm of excellency in whatever is to be wished in a brave prince."† Peacham, enumerating this prince's qualifications, says that he was a good musician, spoke ten or twelve languages, was a universal scholar, could dispute, "even in boots and spurs," for an hour with the best professors on any subject, and was the best bone-setter in the country. He gained, too, much of his popularity by his adherence to the Protestant religion during the Thirty Years' War.

* Gent. Mag., March 1842.

† Peacham's Compleat Gentleman, p. 79.

The PALTSGRAVE became a popular sign at the marriage of Frederick Casimir V., Elector and Count Palatine of the Rhine, King of Bohemia, with Elizabeth, daughter of James I. Trades tokens are extant of a famous tavern, the sign of the PALSGRAVE'S HEAD, without Temple Bar,* which gave its name to Paltsgrave Court, whilst the PALATINE HEAD was an inn near the French 'Change, Soho. PRINCE RUPERT, the Palsgrave's son, who behaved so gallantly in many of the fights during the Civil War, was no doubt a favourite sign after the Restoration. We have an instance of one on the trades token of Jacob Robins, in the Strand.

One of the last foreign princes to whom the signboard honour was accorded, was the KING OF PRUSSIA. This still occurs in many places. After the battle of Rosbach, Frederick the Great, our ally, became the popular hero in England. Ballads were made, in which he was called "Frederick of Prussia, or the Hero." "Portraits of the hero of Rosbach, with his cocked hat and long pigtail, were in every house. An attentive observer will at this day find in the parlours of old-fashioned inns, and in the portfolios of printsellers, twenty portraits of Frederick for one of George II. The sign-painters were everywhere employed in touching up ADMIRAL VERNON into the KING OF PRUSSIA.†"

These words of Macaulay remind us of a passage in the Mirror, No. 82, Saturday, February 19, 1780, bearing on the same subject. In 1739, after the capture of Portobello, Admiral Vernon's "portrait dangled from every signpost, and he may be figuratively said to have sold the ale, beer, porter, and purl of England for six years. Towards the close of that period, the admiral's favour began to fade apace with the colours of his uniform, and the battle of Culloden was total annihilation for him. . . . The DUKE OF CUMBERLAND kept possession of the signboard a long time. In the beginning of the last war, our admirals in the Mediterranean, and our generals in North America, did nothing that could tend in the least degree to move his Royal Highness from his place; but the doubtful battle of Hamellan, followed by the unfortunate convention of Stade, and the rising fame of the Cabinet, or who made themselves famous by the arts of peace, and the more quiet productions of their genius. We find hundreds of admirals and generals on the signboard, but we are not aware that there is one Watt, or one Sir Walter Scott; yet, what glory and pleasure has the nation not derived from their genius! Booksellers formerly honoured the heads and names of great authors with a signboard; but that custom fell into disuse when signs became unnecessary. At present, the publicans only have signs, and they and their customers can much better appreciate "the glorious pomp and pageantry of war," than a parliamentary debate. A victory, with so many of the enemy killed and wounded, and so many colours and stands of arms captured, awakens much more thrilling emotions in their breasts than the most useful invention, or the most glorious work of art.

* The taverns of the seventeenth century appear in many instances to have been upstairs, above shops. In 1679, there was a "Mr Crutch, goldsmith, near Temple Bar, at the Palsgrave Head." In a similar way, a bookseller lived at the sign of the Rainbow, at the same time as one Farr, who opened this place as a coffee-house. Another bookseller, James Roberts, who printed most of the satires, epigrams, and other wasp-stings against Pope, lived at the Oxford Arms, a carriers' inn in Warwick Lane. Finally, Isaac Walton sold his "Complete Angler" "at his shop in Fleet Street, under the King's Head Tavern."

† Macaulay's Biographical Essays, Frederick the Great.

The sea being our proper element, admirals have always had the lion's share of the popular admiration, and their fame appears more firmly rooted than that of generals. Signs of ADMIRAL DRAKE, SIR FRANCIS DRAKE, or the DRAKE ARMS, so common at the water-side in our seaports, shew that the nation has not yet forgotten the bold navigator of good Queen Bess. SIR WALTER RALEIGH has not been quite so fortunate; for though he also came in for a great share of signboard honour, yet it was less owing to his qualities as a commander, than to his reputation of having introduced tobacco into England, whence he became a favourite tobacconist's sign; and in that quality, we find him on several of the shop-bills in the Banks Collection. Signs being frequently used in the last century for political pasquinades, advantage was taken of a tobacconist's sign for the following sharp hit at Lord North:—

"To the Printer of the General Advertiser :—

"SIR,—Being a smoker, I take particular notice of the devices used by different dealers in tobacco, by way of ornament to the papers in which that valuable plant is enclosed for sale; and that used by the worthy Alderman in Ludgate Street, has often given me much pleasure, it having the head of Sir Walter Raleigh, and the following motto round it :—

'Great Britain to great Raleigh owes

This plant and country where it grows.'

To which I offer the following lines by way of contrast; the truth thereof no one can doubt :—

To Rubicon and North, old England owes

The loss of country where tobacco grows.

"I suppose no dealer will chuse to adopt so unfortunate a subject for their insignia; but perhaps, when you have a spare corner in your General Advertiser, it may not be inadmissible, which will oblige.—Yours, A SMOAKER.

"Feb. 1, 1783.

General Advertiser, March 13, 1784."

Brave old ADMIRAL BENBOW, who held up the honour of the British flag in the reign of William III., is still far from uncommon. ADMIRAL DUNCAN, HOWE, and JERVIS still preside over the sale of many a hoghead of beer or spirits; whilst ADMIRAL VERNON seems to have secured himself an everlasting place on the front of the alehouse, by reason of his dashing capture of PORTOBELLO; the name of that town, or sometimes the PORTOBELLO ARMS, being also frequently adopted, instead of the admiral's name. ADMIRAL KEPPEL is another great favourite. There is a public-house with that sign, on the Fulham Road, where, some years ago, the portrait of the admiral used to court the custom of the passing traveller, by a poetical appeal to both man and beast:—

"Stop, brave boys, and quench your thirst;
If you won't drink, your horses must."

But, above all, ADMIRAL RODNEY seems to have obtained a larger share of popularity than even NELSON himself. In Boston there is the RODNEY AND HOOD; and in Creggin, Montgomeryshire, the RODNEY PILLAR Inn, with the following Anacreontic effusion on a double-sided signboard:—

"Under these trees, in sunny weather,
Just try a cup of ale, however;
And if in tempest or in storm,
A couple then to make you warm;
But when the day is very cold,
Then taste a mug a twelvemonth old."

On the reverse:—

"Rest and regal yourself, 'tis pleasant;
Enough is all the present need,
That's the due of the hardy peasant
Who toils all sorts of men to feed.
Then muzzle not the ox when he treads out the corn,
Nor grudge honest labour its pipe and its horn."

The last addition to this portrait gallery, before SIR CHARLES NAPIER, was the head of the gallant besieger of Algiers, LORD EXMOUTH. In 1825, there was one at Barnstaple, in Devon, with the following address to the wayfarer:—

"All you that pace round field or moor,
Pray do not pass John Armstrong's door;
There's what will cheer man in his course,
And entertainment for his horse."

Finally, there is still one sign left in honour of that deserving but unfortunate commander, CAPTAIN COOK, murdered by the natives of Owhyhee in 1779. His name is preserved as the sign of an alehouse in Mariner Street, London.

Though the fame of generals seems to be more short-lived than that of admirals, yet a few ancient heroes still remain. Amongst these, GENERAL ELLIOTT, or LORD HEATHFIELD, the defender of Gibraltar, seems to be one of the greatest favourites; perhaps his popularity in London was not a little increased by the present which he made to Astley, of his charger named Gibraltar; who, performing every evening in the ring, and shining forth in the circus bills, would certainly act as an excellent puff for the general's glory. This hero's popularity is only surpassed by that of the MARQUIS OF GRANBY. Though nearly a century has elapsed since the death of the latter, (Oct. 19, 1770,) his portrait is still one of the most common signs. In London alone, he presides over eighteen public-houses, besides numerous beerhouses. The first one is said to have been hung out at Hounslow, by one Sumpter, a discharged trooper of the regiment of Horse Guards, which the Marquis of Granby had commanded as colonel.

Among the generals of a later period, are GENERAL TARLETON, (or, as he is called on a sign in Clarence Street, Newcastle, COLONEL TARLTON,) GENERAL WOLFE, GENERAL MOORE, and SIR RALPH ABERCROMBIE. At a tavern of this last denomination in Lombard Street, some thirty-five or forty years ago, the "House of Lords' Club" used to meet, not composed, as might be expected from the name, of members of the peerage, but simply of the good citizens of the neighbourhood, each dubbed with a title. The president was styled Lord Chancellor; he wore a legal wig and robes, and a mace was laid on the table before him. The title bestowed upon the members depended on the fee—one shilling constituted a Baron, two shillings a Viscount, three shillings an Earl, four shillings a Marquis, and five shillings a Duke; beyond that rank their ambition did not reach. This club originated early in the eighteenth century, at the FLEECE in Cornhill, but removed to the THREE TUNS in Southwark, that the members might be more retired from the bows and compliments of the London apprentices, who used to salute the noble lords by their titles as they passed to and fro in the streets about their business. One of their last houses was the YORKSHIRE GREY, near Roll's Buildings. At present they are, we believe, extinct. In Newcastle, also, there was ARMS in London. These signs were in honour of William Craven, eldest son of Sir William Craven, knt., (Sheriff of London temp. Queen Elizabeth.) This nobleman passed the greater part of his life abroad, serving the Protestant cause in Holland and in Germany. During the Civil War, he at various times gave pecuniary assistance to King Charles II., who at the Restoration created him Viscount Craven of Uffington, &c. He is said to have been privately married to Elizabeth, daughter of James I., the Queen of Bohemia. He died, April 19, 1697. Though his public and military career had certainly been brilliant, yet he owed his popularity probably more to his civic virtues, shewn during the plague period, when he and General Monck were almost the only men of rank that remained in town to keep order. He even erected a pesthouse at his own expense in Pesthouse Field, Carnaby Market, (now Marshall Street, Golden Square.) His assistance during the frequent London fires, also tended to make him a favourite with the Londoners.

"Lord Craven, in the time of King Charles II., was a constant man at a fire; for which purpose he always had a horse ready saddled in his stables, and rewarded the first that gave him notice of such an accident. It was a good-natured fancy, and he did a good deal of service; but in that reign everything was turned to a joke. The king being told of a terrible fire that was broke out, asked if Lord Craven was there yet. 'Oh!' says somebody by, 'an't please your majesty, he was there before it began, waiting for it, he has had two horses burnt under him already.*' On such occasions he usually rode a white horse, well known to the London mob, which was said to smell the fires from afar off."

The EARL OF ESSEX, Elizabeth's quondam favourite, might have been met with on many signs long after the Restoration. There are trades tokens of a shop or tavern with such a sign on the Bankside, Southwark, and tokens are extant of two other shops that had the ESSEX ARMS. In the last century there was an ESSEX HEAD in Essex Street; in this tavern the Robin Hood Society, "a club of free and candid inquiry," used to meet. It was originally established in 1613, at the house of Sir Hugh Middleton, the projector of the New River for supplying London with water. Its first meetings were held at the houses of members, but afterwards, the numbers increasing, they removed to the above tavern, and its name was altered into the "Essex Head Society." In 1747 it removed to the Robin Hood in Butcher Row, near Temple Bar. The society attained a position of so much importance, that a history of its proceedings was pub-

* Richardsoniana, p. 140.

GATE, a corruption of the Boulogne Gates, which Henry VIII. ordered to be taken away, and transported to Hardes, in Kent, where they still (?) remain. The Bull and Gate was a noted inn in the seventeenth century in Holborn, where Fielding makes his hero Tom Jones put up on his arrival in London. It is still in existence under the same name, though much reduced in size. There is another in New Chapel Place, Kentish Town; and a few imitations of it were carried to distant provincial towns by the coaches of old times.

Another sign of the same period, although not commemorative of a battle, was the GOLDEN FIELD GATE, mentioned by Taylor the water-poet, in 1632, as the sign of an inn at the upper end of Holborn. It was put up in honour of the Champ du Drap d'Or, where Henry VIII. and Francis I.,

"Those suns of glory, those two lights of men,
Met in the vale of Arde."—Henry VIII., a. i. s. 1.

The signs of great men who have distinguished themselves in the civil walks of life are much more scarce. Archimedes we meet with as an optician's sign. He had been adopted by that class of workmen on account of the burning lenses with which he set the Roman fleet on fire at Syracuse. Various implements of their trade were added as distinctions by the several shops who sold spectacles under his auspices, such as GOLDEN PROSPECTS or PERSPECTIVES, (i.e., spectacles or any other glass that assisted the sight,) GLOBES, KING'S ARMS, &c. Among the Bagford Bills there is one of John Marshall, optician on Ludgate Hill, "at the sign of the OLD ARCHIMEDES AND TWO GOLDEN SPECTACLES, which represents Archimedes taking astronomical observations, a huge pair of spectacles being suspended on one side of the sign, and on the other a lantern.* ARCHIMEDES AND THREE PAIR OF GOLDEN SPECTACLES was the sign of another optician in Ludgate Street, 1697, who evidently had adopted Marshall's sign with the addition of one pair of spectacles, in the hope of filching some of his customers. SIR ISAAC NEWTON was another telescope-maker's sign in Ludgate Street circa 1795.† At the present day he occurs on a few public-houses; but it is somewhat more gratifying for our national pride to see a coffee-house in the Rue Arcade, Paris, in effigy" at Castlegate, Berwick, in Nottingham, and in a few other places.

* This John Marshall afterwards, when he was appointed the king's optician, changed his sign into the ARCHIMEDES AND KING'S ARMS, under which we find him, in 1713, advertising his "chrystall dressing-glasses for ladies, which shew the face as nature hath made it, which other looking-glasses do not."

† Banks's Collection.

In 1683, we find SIR EDMUNDBURY GODFREY on the picture-board of Langley Curtis, a bookseller near Fleetbridge. Being the martyr of a party, he undoubtedly for a while must have been a popular sign. LORD ANGLESEY was, in 1679, adopted by an inn in Drury Lane. This, we suppose, was Arthur, second Viscount Valentia, son of Sir Thomas Annesley, (Lord Mountmorris,) and elevated to the British peerage by the title of Earl of Anglesey in 1661; he died in 1686. One of the acts which probably contributed most to his popularity was that he, with the Lord Cavendish, Mr Howard, Dr Tillotson, Dr Burnet, and a few others, appeared to vindicate Lord Russell in the face of the court, and gave testimony to the good life and conversation of the prisoner.

The bulky figure of Paracelsus, or, as he called himself, Philipus Aureolus Theophrastus Paracelsus Bombastus von Hohenheim, used formerly to be a constant apothecaries' symbol. From an advertisement in the London Gazette, July 22-26, 1680, about a stolen horse "with a sowre head," we gather that there was at that time a sign of PARACELUS in Old Fish Street. Information about the horse with "the sowre head" would also be received at a house in Lambeth, with no less a dignitary for its sign than the BISHOP OF CANTERBURY, his grace having been thus honoured from a neighbourly feeling.

Doctor Butler, (ob. 1617,) physician to James I., and, according to Fuller, "the Æsculapius of that age," invented a kind of medicated ale, called Dr Butler's ale, "which, if not now, (1784,) was, a few years ago, sold at certain houses that had the BUTLER'S HEAD for a sign."* One of the last remaining Butler's Heads was in a court leading from Basinghall into Coleman Street.

That singularly successful quack, Lilly, though he ought not to be placed in such good company as the king's physician, was also a constant sign, in the last century, at the door of sham doctors and astrologers. Not unfrequently they combined the BALLS (a favourite sign of the quacks) with Lilly's head, as the BLACK BALL AND LILLYHEAD, the sign of Thomas Saffold, "an approved and licensed physician and student in astrology: he hath practised astronomy for twenty-four years, and hath had the Bishop of London's licence to practise physick ever since the 4th day of September 1674, and hath, he thanks God for it,

* The Angler. Hawkins's edition. 1784.

— Varenne, near Somerset House, in the Strand, at the same period.

A few of our own poets are also common tavern pictures. As early as 1655 we find a (Ben) JONSON'S HEAD tavern in the Strand, where Ben Jonson's chair was kept as a relic.* In that same year it was the sign of Robert Pollard, bookseller, behind the Royal Exchange. Ten years later it occurs in the following advertisement :—

"WHEREAS Thomas Williams, of the society of real and well-meaning Chymists hath prepared certain Medicynes for the cure and prevention of the Plague, at cheap rates, without Benefit to himself, and for the publick good, In pursuance of directions from authority, be it known that these said Medicynes are to be had at Mr Thomas Fidges, in Fountain Court, Shoe Lane, near Fleet Street, and are also left by him to be disposed of at the GREEN BALL, within Ludgate, the Ben Jonson's Head, near Yorkhouse," &c.†

There is still a Ben Jonson's Head tavern with a painted portrait of the poet in Shoe Lane, Fleet Street ; a Ben Jonson's Inn at Pemberton, Wigan, Lancashire ; and another at Weston-on-the Green, Bicester.

SHAKESPEARE'S HEAD is to be seen in almost every town where there is a theatre. At a tavern with that sign in Great Russell Street, Covent Garden, the Beefsteak Society (different from the Beefsteak Club,) used to meet before it was removed to the Lyceum Theatre. George Lambert, scene-painter to Covent Garden Theatre, was its originator. This tavern was at one time famous for its beautifully painted sign. The well-known Lion's Head, first set up by Addison at Button's, was for a time placed at this house.‡ There was another Shakespeare Head in Wych Street, Drury Lane, a small public-house at the beginning of this century, the last haunt of the Club of Owls, so called on account of the late hours kept by its members. The house was

* "On the chair of Ben Johnson, now remaining at Robert Wilson's, at the sign of the Johnson's Head, in the Strand."—Wit and Drollery, 1655, p. 79.

† The News, August 24, 1655. This may have been the above-mentioned tavern, as York House was situated in the Strand on the site of the present York Buildings.

‡ Addison's Lion's Head, the box for the deposition of the correspondence of the Guardian, was originally placed at Button's, over against Tom's in Great Russell Street. "After having become a receptacle of papers and a spy for the Guardian, it was moved to the Shakespeare's Head Tavern, under the Piazza in Covent Garden, kept by a person named Tomkins, and in 1761 was for a short time placed in the Bedford Coffeehouse, immediately adjoining the Shakespeare Tavern, and there employed as a medium of literary communication by Dr John Hill, author of the 'Inspector.' In 1760, Tomkins was succeeded by his waiter, named Campbell, as proprietor of the tavern and Lion's Head, and by him the latter was retained till 1804, when it was purchased by the late Charles Richardson, after whose death in 1827 it devolved to his son, and has since become the property of his Grace the Duke of Bedford."—Till, in his Preface to Descriptive Catalogue of English Medals.

claim'd, unless good Recommendations are given. Drinkers of spirits and swearers have a bad chance."

The MAN OF ROSS is at the present day a signboard at Wye Terrace, Ross, Herefordshire ; the house in which John Kyrle, the Man of Ross, dwelt, was, after his death, converted into an inn. Twenty or thirty years ago the following poetical effusion was to be read stuck up in that inn :—

"Here dwelt the Man of Ross, O traveller here,
 Departed merit claims the rev'rent tear.
 Friend to the friendless, to the sick man health,
 With generous joy he view'd his modest wealth.
 If 'neath this roof thy wine-cheer'd moments pass,
 Fill to the good man's name one grateful glass.
 To higher zest shall memory wake thy soul,
 And virtue mingle in th' ennobled bowl.
 Here cheat thy cares, in generous visions melt,
 And dream of goodness thou hast never felt."

The head of ROWE, the first emendator, corrector, and illustrator of Shakespeare, was in 1735 the sign of a bookseller in Essex Street, Strand. The CAMDEN HEAD and CAMDEN ARMS occur in four instances as the sign of London publicans. Camden Town, however, may perhaps take the credit of this last sign. ADDISON'S HEAD was for above sixty years the sign of the then well-known firm of Corbett & Co.—first of C. Corbett, afterwards of his son Thomas, booksellers in Fleet Street from 1740 till the beginning of this century. DR JOHNSON'S HEAD, exhibiting a portrait of the great lexicographer, is a modern sign in Bolton Court, Fleet Street, opposite to where the great man lived, and which was in his time occupied by an upholsterer. It is sometimes asserted to be the house in which the Doctor resided, but this statement is wrong, for the house in which he had apartments was burned down in 1819. Finally, a portrait of Sterne, under the name of the YORICK'S HEAD, was the sign of John Wallis, a bookseller in Ludgate Street in 1795.

Of modern poets LORD BYRON is the only one who has been exalted to the signboard. In the neighbourhood of Nottingham his portrait occurs in several instances ; his MAZEPPA also is a great favourite, but it must be confessed its popularity has been greatly assisted by the circus, by sensational engravings, and, above all, by that love for horse flesh innate to the British character. DON JUAN also occurs on a publican's signboard at Cawood, Selby, West Riding ; and DON JOHN at Maltby, Rotheram, in the same county ; but perhaps these are merely the names of race horses.

Lane, Hull, and NEPTUNE of course is of frequent occurrence in a country that holds the "Imperium pelagi sævumque tridentem."

The smith being generally a thirsty soul, his patron VULCAN constitutes an appropriate alehouse sign, and in that capacity he frequently figures, particularly in the Black country. Amongst the quaint Dutch signboard inscriptions there is one which, in the seventeenth century, was written under a sign of Vulcan lighting his pipe :—

"In Vulcanus. Hy steekt zyn pyp op aan't vyer Die goed tabak wil hebben die komt alhier."

*Je krygt een gestopte pyp toe en op kermis een glas dik bier."

Vulcan, as the god of fire, without which there is no smoke, was a common tobaccoist's sign in Holland two hundred years ago. One of these dealers had the following rhymes affixed to his Vulcan sign :—

"*Vulcan die lamme smid als hy was moei van smeden
Ging hy wat zitten neer en ruste zyne leden
De Goden zagen 't aan, hy haalde uit zyn zak
Zyn pyppe en zyn doos en rookte doen tabak.*"†

MERCURY, the god of commerce, was of frequent occurrence, as might be expected. Amongst the Banks collection of shop-bills there is one of a fanshop in Wardour Street with the sign of the MERCURY AND FAN. Both CUPID and FLORA were signs at Norwich in 1750,‡ and COMUS is frequently the tutelary god of our provincial public-houses. CASTOR AND POLLUX, represented in the dress of Roman soldiers of the empire standing near a cask of tallow, was the sign of T. & J. Bolt, tallow-chandlers, at the corner of Berner Street, Oxford Street, at the end of the last century, for the obvious reason that, like the Messrs Bolt, they were two brothers that spread light over the world. Our admiration for athletic strength and sports suggested the sign of HERCULES, as well as his biblical parallel SAMSON.

As for the HERCULES PILLARS, this was the classic name for the Straits of Gibraltar, which by the ancients was considered the end of the world; in the same classic sense it was adopted on outskirts of towns, where it is more common now to see the

* At the Vulcan. He lights his pipe at the fire;—whosoever wants to buy good tobacco let him come here;—you will get a pipe filled into the bargain, and a glass of strong beer in fair time.

† Vulcan, that lame blacksmith, when he got tired over his work, sat down a while to rest his limbs. The gods saw it; he took his cutty pipe and his tobacco box out of his pocket and smoked a pipe of tobacco.

‡ Gen. Mag., March 1842.

Joseph Moxon on the West side of Fleet ditch, at the sign of the ATLAS." Equally appropriate was ORPHEUS as the sign of the music shop of L. Peppard, next door to Bickerstaffe's coffee-house, Russell Street, Covent Garden, 1711. No fault either can be found with the GOLDEN FLEECE as the sign of a woollen draper—Jason's golden fleece being an allegory of the wool trade; but at the door of an inn or public-house it looks very like a warning of the fate the traveller may expect within—in being fleeced. In the seventeenth century there was a FLEECE Tavern in St James's:—

"A RARE Consort of four Trumpets Marine, never heard of before in England.* If any person desire to come and hear it, they may repair to the Fleece Tavern near St James's about 2 o'clock in the afternoon every day in the week except Sundays. Every consort shall continue one hour and so to begin again. The best places are 1 shilling, the others sixpence."—London Gazette, Feb. 1-4, 1674.

This is amongst the earliest concerts on record in London. Another example of this sign worth mentioning was the Fleece Tavern, (in York Street,) Covent Garden, which, says Aubrey, "was very unfortunate for homicides; there have been several killed—three in my time. It is now (1692) a private house. Clifton, the master, hanged himself, having perjured himself."† Pepys does not give this house a better character:—"Decemb. 1, 1660. Mr Flower did tell me how a Scotch knight was killed basely the other day at the Fleece in Covent Garden, where there had been a great many formerly killed." On the Continent, also, this symbol was used; for instance, in 1687, by Jean Camusat, a printer in the Rue St Jacques, Paris; his colophon represented Jason taking the golden fleece off a tree, with the motto—"TEGIT ET QUOS TANGIT INAURAT."

Another sign, of which the application is not very obvious, is Pegasus or the FLYING HORSE, unless it refers to this rhyme:—

"If with water you fill up your glasses,
You'll never write anything wise;
For wine is the horse of Parnassus,
Which hurries a bard to the skies."

"John Gay, at the Flying Horse, between St Dunstan's Church

* This was not true, for Pepys went (24th Oct. 1667) to hear the same instrument played by a Mr Prin, a Frenchman, "which he do beyond belief, and the truth is, it do so far outdo a trumpet as nothing more, and he do play anything very true. The instrument is open at the end I discovered, but he would not let me look into it." Phillips, in his "New World of Words," 1696, describes it as "an instrument with a bellows, resembling a lute, having a long neck with a string, which being struck with a hairbow sounds like a trumpet."

† Aubrey, Miscellanies upon various subjects.

and Chancery Lane, 1680," is an imprint under many ballads. John Gay undoubtedly had adopted this sign as a compliment to the Templars, in whose vicinity he lived, and whose arms are a Pegasus on a field arg. As for the poor balladmongers, whose works Gay printed, they certainly put Pegasus too much to the plough, to imagine that he alluded to theirs as a Flying Horse. Instead of the Flying Horse, a facetious innkeeper at Rogate Petersfield, has put up a parody in the shape of the FLYING BULL.

The HOPE and the HOPE AND ANCHOR are constant signs with shop and tavern keepers. Pepys spent his Sunday, the 23d September 1660, at the Hope Tavern, in a not very godly manner; and his account shews the curious business management of the taverns in the time:—

"To the Hope and sent for Mr Chaplin, who with Nicholas Osborne and one Daniel come to us, and we drank of two or three quarts of wine, which was very good; the drawing of our wine causing a great quarrel in the house between the two drawers which should draw us the best, which caused a great deal of noise and falling out, till the master parted them, and came up to us and did give us a long account of the liberty he gives his servants, all alike, to draw what wine they will to please his customers; and we eat above two hundred walnuts."

In consequence of these excesses Master Pepys was very ill next day, but the particulars of the illness, though very graphically entered into the diary, are "unfit for publication."

The FORTUNE was adopted from considerations somewhat similar to those that prompted the choice of the Hope. It occurs as the sign of a tavern in Wapping in 1667. The trades tokens of this house represent the goddess by a naked figure standing on a globe, and holding a veil distended by the wind,—a delicate hint to the customers, for it is a well-known fact that a man who has "a sheet in the wind" is as happy as a king. Doubtless the name of the ELYSIUM, a public-house in Drury Lane about thirty years ago, had also been adopted as suggestive of the happiness in store for the customers who honoured the place by their company.

Ballads, novels, chapbooks, and songs, have also given their contingent. Thus, for instance, the BLIND BEGGAR OF BETHNAL GREEN—still a public-house in the Whitechapel Road—has decorated the signpost for ages. The ballad was written in the reign of Queen Elizabeth; but the legend refers to Henry de Montfort, son of the Earl of Leicester, who was supposed to have fallen at the battle of Evesham in the reign of Henry III. Not only was the Beggar adopted as a sign by publicans, but he also figured on the staff of the parish beadle; and so convinced were the Bethnal Green folks of the truth of the story, that the house called Kirby Castle was generally pointed out as the Blind Beggar's palace, and two turrets at the extremity of the court wall as the place where he deposited his gains.

Still more general all over England is GUY OF WARWICK, who occurs amongst the signs on trades tokens of the seventeenth century: that of Peel Beckford, in Field Lane, represents him as an armed man holding a boar's head erect on a spear. The wondrous strange feats of this knight form the subject of many a ballad. In the Roxburgh Collection there is one headed, "The valiant deads of chivalry atchieved by that noble knight, Sir Guy of Warwick, who, for the love of fair Phillis, became a hermit, and dyed in a cave of a craggy rock a mile distant from Warwick. In Normandy stoutly won by fight the Emperor's daughter of Almayne from many a valiant, worthy knight."* His most popular feat is the slaying of the DUN COW on Dunsmore Heath, which act of valour is commemorated on many signs.

"By gallant Guy of Warwick slain
Was Colbrand, that gigantick Dane.
Nor could this desperate champion daunt
A dun cow bigger than elephaunt.
But he, to prove his courage sterling,
His whinyard in her blood embred;
He cut from her enormous side a sirloin,
And in his porridge-pot her brisket stew'd,
Then butcher'd a wild boar, and eat him barbicu'd."

Huddersford Wiccarnical Chaplet.

A public-house at Swainsthorpe, near Norwich, has the following inscription on his sign of the Dun Cow:—

"Walk in, gentlemen, I trust you'll find
The Dun Cow's milk is to your mind."

Another on the road between Durham and York:—

"Oh, come you from the east,
Oh, come you from the west,
If ye will taste the Dun Cow's milk,
Ye'll say it is the best."

The KING and MILLER is another ballad-sign seen in many places. It alludes to the adventure of Henry II. with the Miller

* See in Bib. Top. Brit., vol. iv., a Critical Memoir on the Story of Guy of Warwick, by the Rev. Samuel Pegge, who supposes that Guy lived in Saxon times, and was the son of Simon, Baron of Wallingford. He married Felicia, (Phyllis,) the daughter and heiress of Rohand, Earl of Warwick, who flourished in the reign of Edward the Elder, and so became Earl of Warwick.

"In Wakefielde there lives a jolly Pindar,
 In Wakefielde all on the greene.
 'There is neither knight nor squire,' said the Pindar,
 'Nor baron so bold, nor baron so bold,
 Dares make a trespass to the town of Wakefielde,
 But his pledge goes to the Pinfold.'"

Drunken Barnaby mentions the sign in Wakefield in 1634 :—

"Straight at Wakefielde I was seen, a',
 Where I sought for George-a-Green, a',
 But could find not such a creature,
Yet on sign I saw his feature.
 Whose strength of ale had so much stirr'd me,
 That I grew stouter far than Jordie."

There was formerly a public-house near St Chad's Well, Clerkenwell, bearing this sign, which at one period, to judge from the following inscription, would seem to have been more famous than the celebrated Bagnigge Wells hard by. A stone in the garden-wall of Bagnigge House said :—

⦿
 S. T.
 THIS IS BAGNIGGE
 HOUSE NEARE
 THE PINDAR A WAKEFEILDE.
 1680.

Among the more uncommon ballad signs, we find the BABES IN THE WOOD at Hanging Heaton, Dewsbury, West Riding. JANE SHORE was commemorated in Shoreditch in the seventeenth century, as we see from trades tokens. VALENTINE AND ORSON we find mentioned as early as 1711,* as the sign of a coffee-house in Long Lane, Bermondsey; and there they remain till the present day.

Other chapbook celebrities are MOTHER SHIPTON, Kentish Town, and Low Bridge, Knaresboro'; which latter village disputes with Shipton, near Londesborough, the honour of giving birth to this remarkable character in the month of July 1488. The fact is duly commemorated under her signboard in the former place :—

"Near to this petrifying wall †
 I first drew breath, as records tell."

Her life and prophecies have at all times been a favourite theme in popular literature. If we may believe her biographers, she

* Daily Courant, Feb. 19, 1711.

† The "Dropping Well," one of the most noted petrifying springs in England, and so named on account of its percolating through the rock that hangs over it.

His prophecies were also translated into Italian, and printed at Venice in 1516. The annotators say it was reported that Merlin, by his enchantments, transported from Ireland those huge stones found in Salisbury plain. His cave was in Clerkenwell, on the site where the alehouse now stands, and was in the reign of James I., one of the London sights strangers went to see.*

We have a well-known chapbook hero in JACK OF NEWBURY, who had already attained to the signboard honours in the seventeenth century, when we find him on the token of John Wheeler, in Soper Lane (now Queen Street, Cheapside,) whilst at present, he may be seen in a full-length portrait in Chiswell Street, Finsbury Square. This Jack of Newbury, alias Winchcombe, alias Smallwoode, "was the most considerable clothier England ever had. He kept an hundred looms in his house, each managed by a man and a boy. He feasted King Henry VIII. and his first Queen Catherine at his own house in Newbury, now divided into sixteen clothiers' houses. He built the Church of Newbury, from the pulpit westward to the town."† At the battle of Flodden in 1513, he joined the Earl of Surrey with a corps of one hundred men, well equipped at his sole expense, who distinguished themselves greatly in that fight. He is buried in Newbury, where his brass effigy is still to be seen, purporting that he died February 15, 1519. An inn bearing his sign in Newbury, is said to be built on the site of the house where he entertained King Harry. Thomas Deloney, the ballad-writer, wrote a tale about him, entitled, "The pleasant history of John Winchcomb, in his younger years called Jack of Newberry, the famous and worthy clothier of England, declaring his life and love, together with his charitable deeds and great hospitalitie. Entered in the Stationers' Book, May 7, 1596."

WHITTINGTON AND HIS CAT is still very common, not only in London but in the country also. Sometimes the cat is represented without her master, as on the token of a shop in Long-acre, 1657, and on the sign of — Varney, a seal-engraver in New Court, Old Bailey, 1783, whose shopbill‡ represents a large cat carved in wood holding an eye-glass by a chain. The story of Whittington is still a favourite chapbook tale, and has its parallel in the fairy tales of various other countries. Straparola, in his "Piacevole Notte," is, we believe, the first who mentions it. The earliest English narrative occurs in Johnson's "Crown Garland of Golden Roses," 1612, but there is an allusion to "Whittington and his Puss" in the play of "Eastward Hoe!" 1603. For more than a century it was one of the stock pieces of Punch and his dramatic troop. Sept. 21, 1688, Pepys went to see it: "To Southwark Fair, very dirty, and there saw the puppet-show of Whittington, which is pretty to see; and how that idle thing do work upon people that see it, and even myself too." Foote, in his comedy of the "Nabob," makes Sir Matthew Mite account for the legend by explaining the cat as the name of some quick-sailing vessels by which Whittington imported coals, which should have been the source of the Lord Mayor's wealth. In the Highgate Road there is a skeleton of a cat in a public-house window, which by the people who visit there is firmly believed to be the earthly remains of Whittington's identical cat. The house is not far distant from the spot where the future Lord Mayor of London stopped to listen to the city bells inviting him to return. It is now marked by a stone, with the event duly inscribed thereon.

* Henry Peacham's Complent Gentleman.

† John Collet's Historical Anecdotes, Add. MSS. 3890, p. 113.

‡ In the Banks Collection.

KING ARTHUR'S ROUND TABLE is to be seen on various public-houses. There is one in St Martin's Court, Leicester Square, where the American champion, Heenan, put up when he came to contest the belt with the valiant Tom Sayers. The same sign is also often to be met with on the Continent. In the seventeenth century there was a famous tavern called la Table Roland in the Vallée de Misère at Paris. JOHN-O'-GROAT'S HOUSE is also used for a sign; there was one some years ago in Windmill Street, Haymarket; and at present there is a JOHN-O'-GROAT'S in Gray Street, Blackfriars Road. Both these and the Round Table contain, we conceive, some intimation of that even-handed justice observed at the houses, where all comers are treated alike, and one man is as good as another.

DARBY AND JOHN, a corruption of Darby and Joan, and borrowed from an old nursery fable, is a sign at Crowle, in Lincolnshire; and HOB IN THE WELL, with a similar origin, at Little Port Street, Lynn; whilst SIR JOHN BARLEYCORN is the hero of a ballad allegorical of the art of brewing, &c.

A favourite ballad of our ancestors originated the sign of the LONDON APPRENTICE, of which there are still numerous examples. How they were represented appears from the Spectator, No. 428, viz., "with a lion's heart in each hand." The ballad informs us that the apprentice came off with flying colours, after endless adventures, one of which was that like Richard Cœur-de-Lion—he “robbed the lion of his heart.” The ballad is entitled “The Honour of an Apprentice of London, wherein he declared his matchless manhood and brave adventures done by him in Turkey, and by what means he married the king’s daughter of that same country.”

THE ESSEX SERPENT is a sign in King Street, Covent Garden, and in Charles Street, Westminster, perhaps in allusion to a fabulous monster recorded in a catalogue of wonders and awful prognostications contained in a broadside of 1704,* from which we learn that, “Before Henry the Second died, a dragon of marvelous bigness was discovered at St Osyph, in Essex.” Had we any evidence that it is an old sign, we might almost be inclined to consider it as dating from the civil war, and hung up with reference to Essex, the Parliamentary general; for though we have searched the chroniclers fondest of relating wonders and monstrous apparitions, we have not succeeded in finding any authority for the St Osyph Dragon, other than the above-mentioned broadside.

Literature of a somewhat higher class than street ballads, has likewise contributed material to the signboards. One of the oldest instances is the LUCRECE, the chaste felo-de-se of Roman history, who, in the sixteenth century, was much in fashion among the poets, and was even sung by Shakespeare. We find that “Thomas Berthelet, prynter unto the kynges mooste noble grace, dwellynge at the sygne of the Lucrece, in Fletestrete, in the year of our Lorde 1536.” In 1557, it was the sign of Leonard Axtell, in St Paul’s Churchyard; and in the reign of Charles I., of Thomas Purfoot, in New Rents, Newgate Market, both booksellers and printers. The COMPLETE ANGLER was the usual sign of fish-tackle sellers in the last century, and the essays of the Spectator made the character of SIR ROGER DE COVERLEY very popular with tobacco-nists.

* This broadside is reprinted in Notes and Queries for January 15, 1859. Sussex had its snake as late as 1614. There is a pamphlet in the Harl. Collection, entitled, “True and Wonderful—a discourse relating a strange and monstrous serpent, (or dragon,) lately discovered, and yet living, to the great annoyance and divers slaughter both of men and cattell, by his strong and violent Poyson, in Sussex, two miles from Horsam, in a woode called St Leonard’s Forrest, and thirtie miles from London, this present month of August 1614.” That this Sussex snake caused a great sensation, appears from the fact that seventeen years after, it is alluded to in “Whimsies: or, A New Cast of Characters,” 1631: “Nor comes his [the ballad-monger’s] invention far short of his imagination. For want of truer relations for a neede, he can find you out a Sussex dragon, some sea or inland monster, drawn out by some Shoe Lane man, [i. e., a sign-painter; they all lived in Harp Alley, Shoe Lane,] in Gorgon-like features, to enforce more horror in the beholder.”

I know that good quarters are waiting
 To welcome old Rosin the Beau (ter.)
 When I am dead and laid out on the counter,
 A voice you will hear from below,
 Singing out brandy and water
 To drink to old Rosin the Beau (ter.)
 You must get some dozen good fellows,
 And stand them all round in a row,
 And drink out of half-gallon bottles,
 To the name of old Rosin the Beau," &c.

These stanzas, and one or two more to the same import, were quite sufficient to make the old Beau a fit subject for the signboard, irrespective of his other amiable qualities held forth in the song. The very common OLD HOUSE AT HOME, too, is borrowed from a once-popular ballad, the verse of which is too well known to need quotation here.

The equally common HEARTY GOOD FELLOW is adopted from a Seven Dials ballad :—

"I am a hearty good fellow,
 I live at my ease,
 I work when I am willing,
 I play when I please.
 With my bottle and my glass,
 Many hours I pass,
 Sometimes with a friend,
 And sometimes with a lass," &c.

Of signboards portraying artists, but few instances occur; and when they do, they are almost exclusively the property of print-sellers. We have only met with three: REMBRANDT'S HEAD, the sign of J. Jackson, printseller, at the corner of Chancery Lane, Fleet Street, 1759; and of Nathaniel Smith, the father (?) of J. T. Smith, in Great May's Buildings, St Martin's Lane. Another member of that family, J. Smith, who kept a printshop in Cheap-side, where several of Hogarth's engravings were published, assumed the HOGARTH'S HEAD for his sign. The third is the VAN DYKE'S HEAD, the sign of C. Philips, engraver and print-publisher in Portugal Street, in 1761. Hogarth also had a head of Van Dyke as his trade symbol, made from small pieces of cork, but being gilt, he called it the GOLDEN HEAD, (see under Miscellaneous Signs.)

In old times, more than at present, music was deemed a necessary adjunct to tavern hospitality and public-house entertainment.

grooms of the chamber at Barn Elms, but lost his situation by reason of some scurrilous reflections on Leicester and Raleigh. He probably also performed at the Curtain in Shoreditch, in which parish he was buried, September 3, 1588. "The great popularity which Tarlton possessed may be readily seen from the numerous allusions to him in almost all the writers of the time, and few actors have been honoured with so many practical tokens of esteem. His portrait graced the ale-house, game-cocks were named after him, and a century after his death, his effigy adorned the jakes.*" The portrait of this famous wit is prefixed to the edition of his jests, printed in 1611, where he is represented in the costume of a clown playing on the tabor and pipe. Another portrait of him occurs as an accompaniment to the letter T, in a collection of ornamental letters,† with the following rhymes:—

"This picture here set down within his letter T, Aright doth shew the forme and shape of Tharleton unto thee.
 When he in pleasaunt wise the counterfeit expreste,
 Of clowne with cote of russet hew, and startups with the reste;
 Who merry many made when he appear'd in sight,
 The grave, the wise, as well as rude, att him did take delight.
 The partie now is gone, and closlie clad in claye;
 Of all the jesters in the lande, he bare the praise awaie.
 Now hath he plaid his parte, and sure he is of this,
 If he in Christe did die to live with Him in lasting bliss."

SPILLER'S HEAD was the sign of an inn in Clare Market, where one of the most famous tavern clubs was held. This meeting of artists, wits, humorists, and actors originated with the performances at Lincoln's Inn, about the year 1697. They counted many men of note amongst their members. Colley Cibber was one of the founders, and their best president, not even excepting Tom d'Urfey. James Spiller, it should be stated, was a celebrated actor circa 1700. His greatest character was "Mat o' the Mint," in the Beggar's Opera. He was an immense favourite with the butchers of Clare Market, one of whom was so charmed with his performances, that he took down his sign of the BULL AND BUTCHER, and put up SPILLER'S HEAD. At Spiller's death, (Feb. 7, 1729,) the following elegiac verse was made by one of the butchers in that locality:—

"Down with your marrow-bones and cleavers all,
 And on your marrow-bones ye butchers fall!
 For prayers from you who never pray'd before,

* Introduction to Tarlton's Jestes, by J. O. Halliwell, † Harl. MSS. 3835.

him by his friend Captain Face, we get some curious information concerning the mysteries of the tobacco trade of that day :—

“ This is my friend Abel, an honest fellow,
He lets me have good tobacco, and he does not Sophisticate it with sack lees or oil,
Nor washes it with muscadell and grains,
Nor buries it in gravel underground,
Wrapp'd up in greasy leather or p— clouts,
But keeps it in fine lily pots, that open'd
Smell like conserve of roses, or French beans.
He has his maple block, his silver tonga,
Winchester pipes, and fire of juniper.
A neat, spruce, honest fellow, and no goldsmith.”

This worthy was, in the end of the last century, the sign of Peter Cockburn, a tobacconist in Fenchurch Street, formerly shopman at the SIR ROGER DE COVERLEY, as he informs the public on his tobacco paper.* According to the custom of the times, and one which has yet lingered in old-fashioned neighbourhoods, this wrapper is adorned with some curious rhymes :—

“ At DRUGGER'S HEAD, without a puff,
You 'll ever find the best of snuff,
Believe me, I 'm not joking ;
Tobacco, too, of every kind,
The very best you 'll always find,
For chewing or for smoaking.
Tho' Abel, when the Humour 's in,
At Drury Lane to make you grin,
May sometimes take his station ;
At number Hundred-Forty-Six,
In Fenchurch Street he now does fix
His present Habitation.
His best respects he therefore sends,
And thus acquaints his generous Friends,
From Limehouse up to Holborn,
That his rare snuffs are sold by none,
Except in Fenchurch Street alone,
And there by Peter Cockburn.”

FALSTAFF, whom we have already mentioned when speaking of Shakespeare, and PAUL PRY, are both very common. The last is even of more frequent occurrence than “ honest Jack ” himself.

Lower down in the scale of celebrities and public characters, we find the court-jester of Henry VIII., OLD WILL SOMERS, the sign of a public-house in Crispin Street, Spitalfields, at the present day. He also occurs on a token issued from Old Fish Street, in which he is represented very much the same as in his

* Banks's Collection.

the auspices of the great TOM SAYERS. One in Pimlico, Brighton, deserves especial mention, as it is reported to be the identical house in which the mighty champion made his entry on the stage of this world, for the noble purpose of dealing and receiving the blows of fistic fortune. But, as in the case of Homer's birthplace, the honour is contested; almost every house in Pimlico lays claim to his nativity, and unless the great man writes his life and settles this mooted point, it is likely to give serious trouble to future historiographers.

Another athlete, TOPHAM, "the strong man," had also his quantum of signboards. "The public interest which his extraordinary exhibitions of strength had always excited did not die with him. His feats were delineated on many signs which were remaining up to 1800. One in particular, over a public-house near the Maypole, in East Smithfield, represented his first great feat of pulling against two dray horses."*

Thomas Topham was born in London in 1710. His strength almost makes the feats of Homer's heroes credible, for, besides pulling against two dray horses, in which he would have been successful if he had been properly placed, he lifted three hogsheds of water, weighing 1836 lbs, broke a rope two inches in circumference, lifted a stone roller, weighing 800 lbs., by a chain with his hands only, lifted with his teeth a table six feet long, with half a hundredweight fastened to the end of it, and held it a considerable time in a horizontal position, struck an iron poker, a yard long and three inches thick, against his bare left arm until it was bent into a right angle, placed a poker of the same dimensions against the back of his neck, and bent it until the ends met, and performed innumerable other remarkable feats.

In DANIEL LAMBERT, whose portly figure acts as sign to a coffee-house on Ludgate Hill, and to a public-house in the High Street, St Martins, Stamford, Lincolnshire, we behold another wonder of the age. This man weighed no less than 52 stone 11 lb. (14 lbs. to the stone.) He was in his 40th year when he died, and the circumstances of his burial give a good idea of his enormous proportions. His coffin, in which there was great difficulty of placing him, was 6 ft. 4 in. long, 4 ft. 4 in. wide, and 2 ft. 4 in. deep. The immense size of his legs made it almost a square case. It consisted of 112 superficial feet of elm, and was built upon two axletrees and four clogwheels, and upon years after we find the following advertisement:—"Yesterday died at the Dwarf Tavern in Chelsea Fields, Mr John Coan, the unparalleled Norfolk Dwarf."—Daily Advertiser, March 17, 1764.

* Fairholt, Remarkable and Eccentric Characters, p. 56.

The name of DIRTY DICK, which graces a public-house in Bishopsgate Without, was transferred to those spirit stores from the once famous DIRTY WAREHOUSE formerly in Leadenhall Street, a hardware shop kept in the end of the last century by Richard Bentley, alias Dirty Dick, in which premises, until about fifteen or twenty years ago, the signboard of the original shop was still to be seen in the window. Bentley was an eccentric character, the son of an opulent merchant, who kept his carriage and lived in great style. In his early life he was one of the beaux in Paris, was presented at the court of Louis XVI., and enjoyed the reputation of being the handsomest and best dressed Englishman at that time in the capital of France. On his return to London he became a new, though not a better, man. Brooms, mops, and brushes were rigorously proscribed from his shop; all order was abolished, jewellery and hardware were carelessly thrown together, covered by the same shroud of undisturbed dust. So they remained for more than forty years, when he relinquished business in 1804. The outside of his house was as dirty as the inside, to the great annoyance of his neighbours, who repeatedly offered Bentley to have it cleaned, painted, and repaired at their expense; but he would not hear of this, for his dirt had given him celebrity, and his house was known in the Levant, and the East and West Indies, by no other denomination than the "Dirty Warehouse in Leadenhall Street." The appearance of his premises is thus described by a contemporary:—

"Who but has seen, (if he can see at all,) Twixt Aldgate's well-known pump and Leadenhall,
 A curious hardware shop, in generall full
 Of wares from Birmingham and Pontipool!
 Begrimed with dirt, behold its ample front,
 With thirty years' collected filth upon 't;
 In festoon'd cobwebs pendant o'er the door,
 While boxes, bales, and trunks are strew'd around the floor.

Behold how whistling winds and driving rain
 Gain free admission at each broken pane,
 Safe when the dingy tenant keeps them out,
 With urn or tray, knife-case or dirty clout!

Thomas Parr was born in 1483, and dying November 15, 1635, at the age of 152, had lived in the reigns of ten several princes,—viz., Edward IV., Edward V., Richard III., Henry VII., Henry VIII., Edward VI., Queen Mary, Queen Elizabeth, James I., and Charles I. He was not the only one of the family who attained to a great age, for the London Evening Post, August 24, 1757, has the following note :—"Last week died at Kanne, in Shropshire, Robert Parr, aged 124. He was great-grandson of old Thomas Parr, who died in the reign of King Charles I., and lies buried in Westminster Abbey. What is very remarkable is, that the father of Robert was 109; the grandfather 113; and the great-grandfather, the said Thomas, is well known to have died at the age of 152." Signs of old Parr are still remaining at Gravesend and at Rochester.

Thomas Hobson, (Hobson's Choice,) the benevolent old carrier, is the sign of two public-houses in Cambridge,—the one called OLD HOBSON, the other HOBSON'S HOUSE. His own inn in London was the BULL INN in Bishopsgate Street, where he was represented in fresco, having a £100 bag under his arm, with the words, "The fruitful mother of an hundred more." There is an engraving of him by John Payne, his contemporary, which also represents him holding a bag of money. Under it are these lines :—

"Laugh not to see so plaine a man in print;
The shadow's homely, yet there's something in't.
Witness the Bagg he wears, (though seeming poore,)
The fertile Mother of a thousand more.
He was a thriving man, through lawful gain,
And wealthy grew by warrantable faime.
Men laugh at them that spend, not them that gather,
Like thriving sonnes of such a thrifty father."

The print also informs us that he died at the age of eighty-six, in the year 1630. Milton, who wrote two epitaphs upon him, says, that "he sickened in the time of his vacancy, being forbid to go to London by reason of the plague."

Among this class of minor celebrities we may also place those who put up their own head for signs. Taylor, the water poet, (see Mourning Crown, pp. 49,) was one of the first. Next to him followed PASQUA ROSE; according to his handbill, "the first who made and publicly sold coffee-drink in England." His establishment was "in St Michael's Alley, in Cornhill, at the sign of his own head." This handbill largely enters into the virtues of the "coffee-drink," gives the natural history of the plant,

The waiter, however, gives the menu, which contains—Bird's nest soup from China ; a ragout of fatted snails ; bantam pig, but one day old, stuffed with hard row and ambergris ; French peas stewed in gravy, with cheese and garlick ; an incomparable tart of frogs and forced meat ; cod, with shrimp sauce ; chickens en surprise, (they had not been two hours from the shell,) and similar dainties.* Pontack contributed much towards bringing the French wines in fashion, being proprietor of some of the Bordeaux vineyards which bore his name.

About the same time another tavern flourished, with its master's head for sign ; this was CAVEAC'S,† celebrated for wine ; of him Amhurst sang :—

"Now sumptuously at Caveac's dine,
And drink the very best of wine."

Though it cannot be said that DON SALTERO put up his portrait for a sign, yet his coffee-house was named after him, and is still extant under the same denomination in Cheyne Walk, Chelsea. This house was opened in 1695 by a certain Salter, who had been servant to Sir Hans Sloane, and had accompanied him on his travels. Chelsea at that time was a village, full of the suburban residences of the aristocracy, and the pleasant situation of Salter's house soon made it the resort of merry companions, on their way to or from friends' villas, or Vauxhall, Jenny Whin's, and other places of public resort in the neighbourhood. Vice-Admiral Mundy, on his return from the coast of Spain, amused with the pedantic dignity of Salter, christened him Don Saltero, and under that name the house has continued till this day.

From his connexion with the great Sir Hans Sloane, and the tradition of a descent from the Tradescants, Salter was of course in duty bound to have a museum of curiosities, which, by gifts from Sir Hans and certain aristocratic customers in the army and navy, soon became sufficiently interesting to constitute one of the London sights. It existed more than a century, and was at last sold by auction in the summer of 1798. From his catalogue ‡ (headed with the words, "O RARE !") we gather that the curiosities fully deserved that name, for amongst them we find : "a piece of St Catherine's skin ;" "a painted ribbon from Jerusalem, with which our Saviour was tied to the pillar when

* Metamorphosis of the Town ; or, a View of the Present Fashions. London : Printed for J. Willford at the THREE FLOWERS DE LUCES, behind the Chapter House in St Paul's Churchyard, 1730.

† Oddly enough, both Cave and Ponto are terms of some games at cards.

‡ There is a copy in the British Museum.

In journals pray direct your friends
 To my Museum-Coffeehouse ;
 And in requital for the timely favour
 I'll gratis bleed, draw teeth, and be your shaver.
 Nay, that your pate may with my noddle tally,
 And you shine bright as I do—marry shall ye.
 Freely consult my revelation Molly ;
 Nor shall one jealous thought create a huff,
 For she has taught me manners long enough.

"Chelsea Knackatory.

DON SALTERO."

At the end of his catalogue a list of the donors is added, most of whom, doubtless, also frequented his house. Amongst them the following names appear :—the Duke of Buccleuch, the Earl of Sutherland, Sir John Balchen, Sir Rob. Cotton, Bart., Sir John Cope, Bart., Sir Thomas de Veil, Sir Francis Drake, Lady Humphrey, Sir Thomas Littleton, Sir John Molesworth, the Hon. Capt. William Montague, Sir Yelverton Peyton, George Selwyn, the Hon. Mr Verney, Sir Francis Windham, &c., besides numbers of naval and military officers.

THE MOTHER REDCAP is a sign that occurs in various places, as in Upper Holloway, in the High Street, Camden Town, in Blackburn, Lancashire, in Edmund's Lowland, Lincolnshire, &c. : whilst there is a FATHER REDCAP at Camberwell Green, but he is merely a creature of the publican's fancy. From the way in which Brathwaite mentions this sign in his "Whimsies of a new Cast of Characters," 1631, it would seem to have been not uncommon at that time. "He [the painter] bestows his pencile on an aged piece of decayed canvas, in a sooty alehouse where MOTHER REDCAP must be set out in her colours." Who the original Mother Redcap was, is believed to be unknown, but not unlikely it is an impersonification of Skelton's famous "Ellinor Rummung," the alewife.

The Mother Redcap at Holloway is named by Drunken Barnaby in his travels. Formerly the following verses accompanied this sign :—

"Old Mother Redcap, according to her tale,
 Lived twenty and a hundred years by drinking this good ale ;
 It was her meat, it was her drink, and medicine besides,
 And if she still had drank this ale, she never would have died."

At one time the Mother Redcap, in Kentish Town, was kept by an old crone, from her amiable temper surnamed Mother Damnable.* This was probably the same person we find else-

* Her portrait, with a poem upon her, too long to quote, occurs in "Portraits and Lives of Remarkable and Eccentric Characters," Westminster, 1819.

1

2

3

4

5

6

noise and nonsense, in particular, one that is rightly-styled the Hog-concert," &c.

Both these houses were named after "the Good Lord Cobham,"—Sir John Oldcastle, who married the heiress of the Cobham family—the first author, as well as the first martyr of noble family in England. Being one of the Lollards, he was accused of rebellion, hanged in chains, and burned alive at St Giles in the Fields, in December 1417. Lord Cobham's estates were close to the site of these two public-houses, which were supposed to comprise a part of the ancient mansion of that nobleman.

The SIR PAUL PINDAR public-house, in Bishopsgate Street Without, is all that remains of the splendid mansion of the rich merchant of that name, who had here a beautiful park, well stocked with game. The house continues almost in its original state, in the Cinque Cento style of ornament; the best part of it is the façade. In "Londiniana," ii. p. 137, is an engraving of a lodge, standing in Half-Moon Alley, ornamented with figures, which tradition says was the keeper's lodge of Sir Paul Pindar's Park. Mulberry trees, and other park-like vestiges, were still within memory in 1829. In Pennant's time it was already a public-house, having for a sign, "a head, called that of the original owner." Sir Paul was a contemporary of Gresham, the founder of the Exchange. He travelled much, and by that means acquired many languages, which, at that time, was a sure way to advancement. James I. sent him as ambassador to the Sultan, from whom he obtained valuable concessions for the English trade throughout the Turkish dominions. After his return, he was appointed farmer of the customs, and frequently advanced money to King James, and afterwards to Charles I. In 1639 he was esteemed worth £236,000, exclusive of bad debts. He expended £19,000 in repairing St Paul's Cathedral, and contributed large sums to various charities, yet, strange to say, died insolvent, Aug. 22, 1650, the year after his royal master had been beheaded. His executor, William Toomes, was so shocked at the hopeless state of Sir Paul's affairs, that he committed suicide, and was buried with all the degrading ceremonies of a felo-de-se.

The WELCH HEAD was the sign of a low public-house in Dyot Street, St Giles. In the last century there was a mendicants' club held here, the origin of which dated as far back as 1660, at which time they used to hold their meetings at the THREE the DRUID AND OAK, and the ROYAL ARCH DRUID, are more to be attributed to various kinds of masonic brotherhoods, than as a mark of respect paid to our aboriginal clergy. The UNION originated with the union of Ireland with this kingdom; the JUBILEE dates from the centenary of the revolution of 1688, held with considerable pomp and national rejoicing, in 1788. The HERO OF SWITZERLAND, Loughborough Road, Brixton, and in a few other places, refers to William Tell; and the SPANISH PATRIOT, (Lambeth Lower Marsh and White Conduit Street,) dates from the excitement of our proposed intervention in the Spanish Succession question, in 1833. The SPANISH GALLEON, Church Street, Greenwich, simply owes its origin to the pictures of our naval victories in the Greenwich Hospital.

These, then, are some of the principal and most curious historic signs. From the perusal of this catalogue, we can draw one conclusion—namely, that only a few of what we have termed “historical signs,” outlive the century which gave them birth. If the term of their duration extends over this period, there is some chance that they will remain in popular favour for a long time. Thus, in the case of most heroes of the last century, few publicans certainly will know anything about the Marquis of Granby, Admiral Rodney, or the Duke of Cumberland, yet their names are almost as familiar as the Red Lion, or the Green Dragon, and have indeed become public-household words. Once that stage past, they have a last chance of continuing another century or two—namely, when those heroes are so completely forgotten, that the very mystery of their names becomes their recommendation; such as the Grave Morris, the Will Sommers, the Jack of Newbury, &c.

The origin of the sign of the THREE CROWNS is thus accounted for by Bagford :*—"The mercers trading with Collen (Cologne) set vp ther singes ouer ther dores of ther Houses the three kinges of Collen, with the Armes of that Citye, which was the Three Crouens of the former kinges, in memory of them, and by those singes the people knew in what wares they deld in." Afterwards, like all other signs, it was used promiscuously, and thus it gave a name to a good old-fashioned inn in Lichfield, the property of Dr Johnson, and the very next house to that in which the doctor was born.

Frequently the Royal Crown is combined with other objects, to amplify the meaning, or to express some particular prerogative; such are the CROWN AND CUSHION, being the Crown as it is carried before the king in coronation, and other ceremonies. We even meet with the Two CROWNS AND CUSHIONS; that is, the Crown for the King and for the Queen, which was the sign of a Mr Arne, an upholsterer in Covent Garden, the hero of several Tatlers and Spectators, and father of the celebrated musician and composer, Dr Arne. This political upholsterer also figures in a farce by Murphy, entitled "The Upholsterer; or what news?" The four Indian princes referred to in Tatler, No. 155, who came to England in the reign of Queen Anne, to implore the help of the British Government against the encroachments of the French in Canada, seem to have lodged in this man's house,—a circumstance frequently alluded to in the papers of the Tatler and other periodicals of the time.

The CROWN AND GLOVE refers to the well-known ceremony of the Royal Champion at the Coronation. It occurs as a sign at Stannington, Sheffield, Eastgate Row, South Chester, &c. The ROYAL CHAMPION himself figures in George Street, Oxford. In the Gazetteer for August 20, 1784, we find an anecdote recorded concerning the Royal Champion, which is almost too good to be true :—"At the coronation of King William and Queen Mary, the Champion of England dressed in armour of complete and glittering steel; his horse richly caparisoned, and himself, and beaver finely capped with plumes of feathers, entered Westminster Hall while the King and Queen were at dinner. And, at giving the usual challenge to any one that disputed their majesties' right to the crown of England, (when he has the honour to drink the Sovereign's health out of a golden cup, always his fee,) after he had flung down his gauntlet on the pavement, an old woman, who entered the hall on crutches, (which she left behind her,) took it up, and made off with great celerity, leaving her own glove, with a challenge in it to meet her the next day at an appointed hour in Hyde Park. This occasioned some mirth at the lower end of the hall: and it was remarkable that every one was too well engaged to pursue her. A person in the same dress appeared the next day at the place appointed, though it was generally supposed to be a good swordsman in that disguise. However, the Champion of England politely declined any contest of that nature with the fair sex, and never made his appearance."

* Harl. MSS. 5010, vol. I. fol. 193. The reader will be amused with the spelling of this extract from the original manuscript, written when Addison was penning "Spectators," and many classic English compositions were issuing from the press. Old Mr Bagford was a genuine antiquary, and despised new hats, new coats, and anything approaching the new style of spelling, with other changes then being introduced.

The CROWN AND SCEPTRE, another of the royal insignia, is named by Misson* in the following incident:—"Butler, the keeper of the Crown and Sceptre tavern, in St Martin's Lane, told me that there was a tun of red port drunk at his wife's burial, besides mulled white wine. Note.—No men ever goe to women's burials, nor the women to the men's; so that there were none but women at the drinking of Butler's wine. Such women in England will hold it out with the men, when they have a bottle before them, as well as upon th' other occasion, and tattle infinitely better than they." X

The CROWN AND MITRE, indicative of royalty and the church, is the sign of a High Church publican at Taunton; and the BIBLE AND CROWN has for more than a century and a half been the sign of Rivingtons the publishers. (See under Religious Signs.) The King and Parliament are represented by the well-known CROWN AND WOOLPACK, which at Gedney Holbeach, in Lincolnshire, has been corrupted into the CROWN AND WOODPECKER. The CROWN AND TOWER, at Taunton, may refer to the regalia kept in the Tower, or to the king being "a tower of strength." A similar symbol seems to be intended in the CROWN AND COLUMN, Ker Street, Devonport, perhaps implying the strength of royalty when supported by a powerful and united nation.

The CROWN AND ANCHOR, the well-known badge of the Navy, is a great favourite. One of the most famous taverns with this

* Misson's Memoirs and Observations in his Travels over England. London, 1719.

sign was in the Strand, where Dr Johnson often used to "make a night of it." "Soon afterwards," says Boswell, "in 1768, he supped at the Crown and Anchor in the Strand, with a company whom I collected to meet him. There were Dr Percy, now bishop of Dromore; Dr Douglas, now bishop of Salisbury; Mr Langton; Dr Robertson, the historian; Dr Hugh Blair, and Mr Thomas Davis." On this occasion the great doctor was unusually colloquial, and according to his amiable custom "tossed and gored several persons."

The famous "Crown and Anchor Association" against so-called Republicans and Levellers—as the reformers were styled by the ministerial party in 1792—owed its name to this tavern. Its rise and progress is rather curious: it was undertaken at the instance of Pitt and Dundas, by John Reeves, a barrister. Reeves, at first, could get no one to join him, but, to meet the wishes of his employers, used to go to the Crown and Anchor, draw up some resolutions, pass them nem. con., and sign them John Reeves, chairman: thus being in his own person, meeting, chairman, and secretary. In this way they were inserted in all the papers of the three kingdoms, the expense being no object to the persons concerned. Meetings of the counties were advertised, but the first, second, and third consisted of Reeves alone, and it was not till the fourth meeting that he had any coadjutors. The political effervescence created by this society, its imitations and branches, form part of the history of the nation.

In the year 1800 the Farming Society proposed to have an experimental dinner in order to ascertain the relative qualities of the various breeds of cattle in the kingdom; the dinner was planned and patronised by Sir John Sinclair, and the execution intrusted to Mr Simpkins, landlord of the Crown and Anchor, who sent a tender of the most Brobdignagian dinner probably ever heard of. Twelve kinds of oxen and sheep of the most famous breed, eight kinds of pork, and various specimens of poultry, were to bleed as victims in this holocaust to the devil of gluttony; the fish was only to be from fresh waters, such as were "entitled to the attention of British farmers;" there were various kinds of vegetables, nine sorts of bread, besides veal, lamb, hams, poultry, tarts and puddings, all of which were to be washed down by a variety of strong and mild ales, stout, cider, Perry, and "British" spirits. Tickets one guinea each.*

* England is the country, par excellence, for gigantic dinners, amongst which agri-was also adopted as an alehouse sign : we find it as such in 1718 :—

"ON EASTER Monday, at the Crown and Last at Primlico (sic) in Chelsea road, a silver watch, value 30 sh., is to be bowled for; three bowls for six pence, to begin at Eight of the clock in the morning and continues till Eight in the evening. N.B.—They that win the watch may have it or 30s."*

The CROWN AND HALBERT was, in 1790, the sign of a cutler in St Martin's Churchyard;† the CROWN AND CAN occurs in St John Street; and the CROWN AND TRUMPET at Broadway, Worcester: this last may either allude to the trumpet of the royal herald, or simply signify a crowned trumpet.

Of the KING'S ARMS, and the QUEEN'S ARMS, there are innumerable instances; they are to be found in almost every town or village. The story is told that a simple clodhopper once walked ever so many miles to see King George IV. on one of his journeys, and came home mightily disgusted, for the king had arms like any other man, while he had always understood that his majesty's right arm was a lion and his left arm a unicorn.

Grinling Gibbons, the celebrated carver and sculptor, lived at the sign of the King's Arms in Bow Street, from 1678 until 1721, when he died. This house is alluded to in the Postman, January 24, 1701-2 :—

"On Thursday, the house of Mr Gibbons, the carver in Bow Street, fell down, but by special providence none of the family were killed; but, 'tis said, a young girl which was playing in the court being missed, is supposed to be buried in the rubbish."

At the Haymarket, corner of Pall Mall, stood the QUEEN'S ARMS tavern, in the reign of Queen Anne. At the accession of George I. it was called the King's Arms, and there, in 1734, the Whig party used to meet to plan opposition to Sir Robert Walpole. This club went by the name of the Rump-steak Club.

Faulkner‡ says that at the King's Arms, in the High Street, Fulham, the Great Fire of London was annually commemorated on the 1st of September, and had been continued without interruption until his time. It was said to have taken its rise from a number of Londoners who had been burnt out, and who, having no employment, strolled out to Fulham, on their way collecting a quantity of hazel nuts, from the hedges, with which they

* Original Weekly Journal, March 29 to April 3, 1718.

† Banks Bills.

‡ Historical and Topographical Account of the Parish of Fulham, 1813, p. 271.

bill, (in the Bagford collection,) had, "by experience and ingenuity learnt the art of taking out and curing all manner of corns without any pain;" he also sold "the famousteſt ware in all England, which never fails curing the toothache in half an hour." It was customary with thoſe who were "ſworn ſervants to his Maſteſty,"—i.e., who had the lord chamberlain's diploma, to ſet up the royal arms beſide their ſign. The ſaid Thomas, however, does not appear to have had this honour, for not a word about it is mentioned in his bill, ſo that he muſt have ſet up the Queen's Arms merely to blind the public. The name of the perſon who filled the important office of corn-cutter to Queen Anne, I am afraid is loſt to poſterity, but, en revanche, we know who drew King Charles II.'s teeth, for the Rev. John Ward has recorded in his Diary.* "Upon a ſign about Fleet-bridge this is written,—'Here lives Peter de la Roch and George Goſlin, both which, and no others, are ſworn operators to the king's teeth.'"

Royal badges, and the ſupporters of the arms of various kings, were in former times largely uſed as ſigns. The following is a liſt of the ſupporters :—

RICHARD II., Two Angels, (blowing trumpets.)

HENRY IV., Swan and Antelope.

HENRY V., Lion and Antelope.

HENRY VI., Two Antelopes.

EDWARD IV., Lion and Bull.

EDWARD V., Lion and Hind.

RICHARD III., Two Boars.

HENRY VII., Dragon and Greyhound.

HENRY VIII., Lion and Dragon.

EDWARD VI., Lion and Dragon.

MARY, Eagle and Lion.

ELIZABETH, Lion and Dragon.

JAMES I., Lion and Unicorn, which have continued ever ſince.

Of early royal badges an intereſting liſt occurs in Harl. MS., 304, f. 12 :—

"King Edward the firſt after the Conqueſt, ſonne to Henry the third, gave a Roſe gold, the ſtalke vert.

"King Edward the iiij gave a lyon in his proper coulour, armed azure langued or. The ouſtrich fether gold, the pen gold, and a faucon in his proper coulour and the Sonne Riſing.

"The prince of Wales the oſtrich fether pen and all arg.

* Diary of the Rev. John Ward, M.A., 1648-1679. London, 1839.

"Queen Philipe, wyff of Edward the iij^d. gave the whyte hynd.

"Edmond, Duk of York, sonne of Edward the iij, gave the Faucon arg. and the Fetterlock or.

"Richard the second gave the White hart, armed, horned, crowned or, and the golden son.

"Henry, sonne to the Erl of Derby, first Duk of Lancaster, gave the red rose uncrowned, and his ancestors gave the Fox tayle in his prop. coulor and the ostrich fether ar. the pen ermyn.

"Henry the iiij gave the Swan ar. and the antelope.

"Henry the v gave the Antelope or, armed, crowned, spotted (?) and horned gold and the Red Rose uncrowned and the Swan silver, crown and collar gold, by the Erldom of Herford.

"Henry the vi gave the same that his father gave.

"Edward the iiij gave the Whyte Lyon and the Whyte Rose and the Blak Bull uncrowned.

"Richard the iij gave the Whyte Boar and the Whyte Rose, the clayes gold.

"Henry the seventh gave the hawthorn tree vert and the Porte Cullys and the Red Rose and the Whyte Crowned.

"The Ostrych fether silver, the pen gobone sylver and azur, is the Duk of Somerset's bage.

"The Shypmast with the tope and sayle down is the bage of . . .

"The Cresset and burnyng fyer is the bage of the Admyrallyte.

"The Egle Russet with a maydenshead, abowt her neke a Crowne gold, is the bage of the mannor of Conysborow.

"The Duk of York's bage is the Faucon and the Fetterlock.

"The Whyte Rose by the Castell of Clyfford.

"The Black Dragon by the Erldom of Ulster.

"The Black Bull horned and clayed gold by the honor of Clare.

"The Whyte Hynd by the fayre mayden of Kent.

"The Whyte Lyon by the Erldom of Marche.

"The ostrych fether silver and pen gold ys the kinges.

"The ostrych fether pen and all sylver ys the Pryncees.

"The ostrych fether sylver, pen ermyn is the Duke of Lancasters.

"The ostrych fether sylver and pen gobone is the Duke of Somersets."

Many of these badges, as will be seen afterwards, have come down on signboards even to the present day. Equally common are the Stuart badges, which were:—

The red rose of Lancaster and the white rose of York frequently placed on sunbeams; sometimes the red rose charged with the white.

The rose dimidiated with the pomegranate, symbolical of the connexion between England and Spain by the marriage of Catherine of Arragon; for the same reason the castle of Castille, and the sheaf of arrows of Granada, occur amongst their badges.

The portcullis, borne by the descendants of John of Gaunt, who was born in Beaufort Castle, whence, pars pro toto, the gate was used to indicate the castle.

The falcon and fetterlock, badge of Henry VII., on account of his descent from Edinond of Langley, Duke of York.

The red dragon, the ensign of the famous Cadwallar, the last of the British kings, from whom the Tudors descended.

The hawthorn bush crowned, which Henry VII. adopted in allusion to the royal crown of Richard III. having been found hidden in a hawthorn bush after the battle of Bosworth.

The white falcon crowned and holding a sceptre was the badge of Queen Anna Boleyn, and of Queen Elizabeth her daughter.

X The phoenix in flames was adopted by Edward VI. in allusion to his birth, having been the cause of his mother's death; afterwards he also granted this badge to the Seymour family.

In pondering over this class of signs great difficulty often arises from the absence of all proof that the object under consideration was set up as a badge, and not as a representation of the actual animal. As no amount of investigation can decide this matter, we have been somewhat profuse in our list of badges, in order that the reader should be able to form his own opinion upon that subject. Thus, for instance, with the first sign that offers itself, the ANGEL AND TRUMPET, it is impossible to say whether the supporters of Richard II. gave rise to it, or whether it represents Fame. Various examples of it still occur, and a very good carved specimen may be seen above a draper's shop in Oxford Street. It is also the name of alehouses in King Street, Holborn, and in Stepney, High Street, &c.

The ANTELOPE is not very common now, although in 1664 there was a tavern with this sign in W. Smithfield, the trades token of this house bearing the following legend :—BIBIS. VINUM. SALUTA. ANTELOP. The Rev. John Ward tells a very feeble college joke concerning the Antelope Tavern in Oxford :—

"I have heard of a fellow at Oxford, one Ffrank Hil by name, who kept the Antelope; and if one yawned, hee could not chuse but yawne, that vppon a time some schollars hawing stoln his ducks, hee had them to the Vice chancelor, and one of the scholars got behind the Vice chancelor, and when the fellow beganne to speak hee would presently fall a yawning, in-somuch that the Vice chancelor turned the fellow away in great indignation." *

Macklin, the centenarian comedian, who died in 1797, used for thirty years and upwards to visit a public-house called the Antelope in White Hart yard, Covent Garden, where his usual on a trades token of Holborn, representing a dragon pierced with an arrow, evidently some family crest.

* Diary of Rev. John Ward, M.A., 1648-1679, p. 122.

The WHITE HART was the favourite badge of Richard II. At a tournament held in Smithfield in 1390, in honour of the Count of St Pol, Count of Luxemburg, and the Count of Ostrevant, eldest son of Albert, Count of Holland and Zealand, who had been elected members of the garter, "all the kynges house were of one sute; theyr cotys, theyr armys, theyr sheldes, and theyr trappours, were browdrid all with whyte hertys, with crownes of gold about their neck, and cheynes of gold hanging thereon, whiche hertys was the kynges leverye that he gaf to lordes, ladyes, knyghtes, and squyers, to knowe his household people from others."*

The origin of this White Hart, with a collar of gold round its neck, dates from the most remote antiquity. Aristotle† reports that Diomedes consecrated a white hart to Diana, which, a thousand years after, was killed by Agathocles, king of Sicily. Pliny‡ states that it was Alexander the Great, who caught a white stag and placed a collar of gold round its neck. This marvellous story highly pleased the fancy of the mediæval writers, always in quest of the wonderful. They substituted Julius Cæsar for Alexander the Great, and transplanted the fable to western regions, in consequence of which various countries now claim the honour of having produced the white hart, collared with gold. One was said to have been caught in Windsor Forest, another on Rothwell Haigh Common, in Yorkshire, a third at Senlis, in France, and a fourth at Magdeburg. This last was killed by Charlemagne. The same emperor is also reported to have caught a white stag in the woods of Holstein, and to have attached the usual golden collar round its neck. More than three centuries after, in 1172, this animal was killed by Henry the Lion, and the whole story is, to this day, recorded in a Latin inscription on the walls of Lubeck Cathedral.

Amongst the oldest inns which bore this sign, the White Hart, in the High Street, Borough, ranks foremost in historical interest. Here it was that Jack Cade established his headquarters, July 1, 1450. "And you, base peasants, do ye believe him? Will you needs be hanged with your pardons about your necks? Hath my sword therefore broken through London gates, that ye should appears that she made some successful cures before Sir Hans Sloane, in the Grecian Coffee-house. For a time she was in affluent circumstances, kept a carriage and four, had a plate of ten guineas run for at the Epsom races, where she lived, frequented theatres, and was quite the lion of a season. Ballads were made upon her, songs were introduced on the stage, in which the "Doctress of Epsom" was exalted to the tune of Derry Down; in short, she was called the "Wonder of the Age." But, alas! the year after all this éclat, we read in the same Grub Street Journal, that had recorded all her greatness—"December 22, 1737. Died last week at her lodgings, near the Seven Dials, the much-talked of Mrs Mapp, the bonesetter, so miserably poor, that the parish was obliged to bury her." Sic transit gloria mundi!

* Caxton's Chronicle at the end of Polychronicon, lib. ult. chap. vi.

† Hist., lib. ix. cap. vi.

‡ Nat. Hist., lib. viii. cap. ii.

Lastly, we must mention the White Hart, at Scole, in Norfolk, as most of all bearing upon our subject, for that inn had certainly the most extensive and expensive sign ever produced. It is mentioned by Sir Thomas Brown, March 4, 166 $\frac{1}{2}$ —"About three miles further, I came to Scoale, where is a very handsome inne, and the noblest signepost in England, about and upon which are carved a great many stories as of Charon and Cerberus, Actæon and Diana, and many others; the signe itself is a White Hart, which hanges downe carved in a stately wreath." A century later, it is again mentioned. Speaking of Osmundestone, or Scole, Blomefield says—"Here are two very good inns for the entertainment of travellers. The White Hart is much noted in these parts, being called by way of distinction Scole Inn; the house is a large brick building adorned with imagery and carved work in several places, as big as the life; it was built in 1655 by James Peck, Esq., whose arms impaling his wife's are over the porch door. The sign is very large, beautified all over with a great number of images of large stature carved in wood, and was the work of Fairchild; the arms about it are those of the chief towns and gentlemen in the county." "There was lately a very round large bed, big enough to hold 15 or 20 couples, in imitation (I suppose) of the remarkable great bed at Ware. The house was in all things accommodated at first for large business; but the road not supporting it, it is much in decay at present." A correspondent in Notes and Queries says:—"I think the sign was not taken down till after 1795, as I have a recollection of having passed under it when a boy, in going from Norwich to Ipswich."

(see Trades' Tokens,) may have had the same origin, whilst the BULL AND STIRRUP, in Upper Northgate, Chester, probably comes from the Bull and Fetterlock, another combination of badges of the house of York.

From this family are also derived the BLUE BOAR and the WHITE BOAR. One of the badges of Richard, Duke of York, father of Edward IV., was "a blewe Bore with his tuskis and his cleis and his membres of gold."* The heraldic origin of this sign, of which there are still innumerable instances all over England, is now so completely lost sight of, that in many places it passes under the ignoble appellation of the BLUE PRO.

The WHITE BOAR was the popular sign in Richard the Third's time, that king's cognizance being a boar passant argent, whence the rhyme which cost William Collingborne his life :—

"The Cat, the Rat, and Lovell our Dogge, Rulen all England vnder an Hogge."†

The fondness of Richard for this badge appears from his wardrobe accounts for the year 1483, one of which contains a charge "for 8000 bores made and wrought upon fustian," and 5000 more are mentioned shortly afterwards. He also established a herald of arms called Blanc Sanglier, and it was this trusty squire who carried his master's mangled body from Bosworth battle-field to Leicester.

After Richard's defeat and death the White Boars were changed into Blue Boars, this being the easiest and cheapest way of changing the sign; and so the Boar of Richard, now painted "true blue," passed for the Boar of the Earl of Oxford, who had largely contributed to place Henry VII. on the throne. Even the White Boar Inn at Leicester, in which Richard passed the last night of his royalty and of his life, followed the general example, and became the Blue Boar Inn, under which sign it continued until taken down twenty-five or thirty years ago. The bed in which the king slept was preserved, and continued for many generations one of the curiosities shewn to strangers at Leicester. It was said that a large sum of money had been discovered in its double bottom, which the landlord himself quietly appropriated. The discovery, however, got wind, and his widow was killed and robbed by some of her guests, in connivance with a maid-servant.

* Badges of Cognizance of Richard, Duke of York, written on a blank leaf at the beginning of Digby MS. 82. Bodleian Library, Oxford. Archæologia xvii. 1814.

† The Cat, William Catesby; the Rat, Sir Richard Ratcliffe; Lovell our dog, Lord Lovel.

They carried away seven horse-loads of treasure. This murder was committed in 1605.*

The sign of the White Boar, however, did not become quite extinct with the overthrow of the York faction, for we find it still in 1542, as appears from the following title of a very scarce book :—

"David's Harp full of most delectable harmony newly strung and set in Tune by Thos. Basille y^e Lord Cobham. Imprinted at London in Buttolp lane at y^e sign of y^e White Boar by John Mayler for John Gough, 1542." †

The FIREBEACON, a sign at Fulston, Lincolnshire, was a badge of Edward IV., and also of the Admiralty.

The HAWTHORN, or HAWTHORNEBUSH, which we meet in so many places, may be Henry VII.'s badge, but various other causes may have contributed to the popularity of that sign, such as the custom of gathering bunches of hawthorn on the first of May. Magic powers, too, are attributed to this plant. "And now," says Reginald Scott, "to be delivered from witches themselves they hange in their entrees an hearb called pentaphyllon, cinquefole, also an oliue branch, also franckincense, myrrh, valerian veruen, palme, anterihmon, &c. ; also Haythorne, otherwise whitethorne, gathered on Maiedaie," &c.‡

The GUN, or CANNON, was the cognizance of King Edward VI., Queen Mary, and Queen Elizabeth. In the beginning of the eighteenth century it was of such frequent occurrence that the Craftsman, No. 638, observed—"Nothing is more common in England than the sign of a cannon." Sarah Milwood, the "wanton" who led George Barnwell astray, lived, according to the ballad, in Shoreditch, "next door unto the Gun." At the present day it is still a great favourite. In the neighbourhood of arsenals its adoption is easily explained.

About eighty years ago there was a famous Cannon Coffee-house at the corner of Trafalgar Square, at the end of Whitcombe Street or Hedgelane ; its site is now occupied by the Union Club. From this coffeehouse Hackman saw Miss Ray drive past on her way to Covent Garden Theatre, when he followed and shot her as she was entering her coach after the performance. The Gun was also a sign with many booksellers, as in the case of

* Sir Roger Twisden's Commonplace Books, 1653, as quoted in extenso in Notes and Queries, Aug. 8, 1857. Mr James Thompson, in his "History of Leicester," informs us that one man was hanged and a woman burned for this crime, and not seven persons capitally executed, according to the popular tradition.

† Harl. MS. 5610 ; of this printer Bagford says : "I do not find he printed many books, or at least few of them have come to my hand."

‡ Reginald Scott, The Discovery of Witchcraft, b. xii. ch. xviii. p. 208, 1584.

Edward White at the Little North Door of St Paul's Church, 1579; Thomas Ewster in Ivy Lane, 1649; Henry Brome, at the West End of St Paul's Churchyard, 1678, and various others.

The SWAN was a favourite badge of several of our kings, as Henry IV., Edward III. At a tournament in Smithfield the last king wore the following rather profane motto:—

“Hay, hay, the wyth Swan,
By God's soule I am thy man.”

Thomas Woodstock, Duke of Gloucester, used the same cognizance; whence Gower styles him “cignus de corde benignus;” whilst Cecily Nevil, Duchess of York, mother of Edward IV. and Richard III., likewise had a swan as supporter of her arms.

The sign of the SWAN AND MAIDENHEAD, at Stratford-on-Avon, may have originated in one of the royal badges; for we find that in 1375 the Black Prince bequeathed to his son Richard his hangings for a hall, embroidered with mermen, and a border of red and black empaled, embroidered with swans having ladies' heads.* The SWAN AND FALCON (two badges of Edward III.) was a sign in Hereford, in 1775, as appears from the following advertisement:—

“HEREFORD MACHINE.

“IN a Day and a Half twice a week, continues flying from the Swan and Falcon, in Hereford, Monday and Thursday mornings; and from the Bolt-in-Tun, in Fleet Street, London, Monday and Thursday evenings. Fare 19s.; outsidess half.”—Hereford Journal, January 12, 1775.

The SWAN AND WHITE HART may have been originally the Swan and Antelope, supporters of the arms of Henry IV., but as it at present stands two distinct royal badges are represented. This sign occurs on a trades-token of St Giles in the Fields, in the second half of the seventeenth century.

The RISING SUN was a badge of Edward III., and forms part of the arms of Ireland; but the Sun Shining was a cognizance of several kings. Various other causes may have led to the adoption of that luminary as a sign. (See Miscellaneous Signs.)

Lions have been at all times, and still continue, greater sign-board favourites than any other heraldic animals. The lion rampant most frequently occurs, although in late years naturalism has crept in, and the felis leo is often represented standing or crouching, quite regardless of his heraldic origin. The lion of the sign-board being seldom seen passant, it is more than probable that it was not derived from the national coat of arms, but rather from some badge, either that of Edward III. or from the WHITE LION of Edward IV. Though silver in general was not used on English signboards yet, the White Lion was anything but uncommon. Several examples occur amongst early booksellers. Thus in 1604 the "Shepherd's Calendar" was "printed at London by G. Elde, for Thomas Adams, dwelling in Paule's Churchyarde, at the signe of the White Lion." In 1652 we meet with another bookseller, John Fey, near the New Exchange; and about the same period John Andrews, a ballad printer, near Pye Corner, who both had the sign of the White Lion. For inns, also, it was not an uncommon decoration. Thus the White Lion in St John's Street, Clerkenwell, was originally an inn frequented by cattle-drovers and other wayfarers connected with Smithfield market. Formerly it was a very extensive building, two of the adjoining houses and part of White Lion Street, all being built on its site. The house now occupied by an oilshop was in those days the gateway to the inn-yard, and over it was the sign, in stone relief, a lion rampant, painted white, inserted in the front wall. It still remains in its original position, with the date 1714, when it was probably renewed. Pepys's cousin, Anthony Joyce, drowned himself in a pond behind this inn. He was a tavern-keeper himself, and kept the THREE STAGS at Holborn, (a house of which tokens are extant.) Heavy losses by the fire of 1666 preyed upon his mind. He imagined that he had not served God as he ought to have done, and in a moment of despair committed the rash act. We have another, and not uninteresting instance, of this sign. "Sir Thomas Lawrence's father kept the White Lion Hotel at Bristol. He afterwards removed to the Bear, at Devizes, where he failed in business. It seemed that it was this last speculation in hotel-keeping which ruined him, with reference to which local wits used to say, "It was not the Lion but the Bear that eat him up."—Bristol Times, June 4, 1859.

* Archæologia, vol. xxix. 1840.

Since pictorial or carved signs have fallen into disuse, and only names given, the SILVER LION is not uncommon, though in all probability simply adopted as a change from the very frequent Golden Lion. Thus there is one in the High Street, Poplar; in the London Road, and Midland Road, Derby; in the Lilly Road, Luton, Herts, &c. The Red Lion is by far the most common; doubtless it originated with the badge of John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, married to Constance, daughter of Don Pedro the Cruel, king of Leon and Castille. The duke bore the lion rampant gules of Leon as his cognizance, to represent his claim to the throne of Castille, when that was occupied by Henry de Transtamare. In after years it may often have been used to represent the lion of Scotland.

The Red Lion Inn at Sittingbourne is a very ancient establishment. A new landlord, who entered circa 1820, issued the following advertisement:—

“W^M. WHITAKER having taken the above house, most respectfully solicite the custom and support of the nobility and gentry, &c., &c.
“The antiquity of the inn, and the respectable character which it has in history are recorded as under:—

“Sittingbourne, in Kent, is a considerable thoroughfare on the Dover Road, where there are several good inns, particularly the Red Lion, which is remarkable for an entertainment, made by Mr John Norwood, for King Henry the Fifth, as he returned from the battle of Agincourt, in France, in the year 1415, the whole amounting to no more than Nine Shillings and Ninepence. Wine being at that time only a penny a pint, and all other things being proportionably cheap.

P.S.—The same character in a like proportionate degree Wm. Whitaker hopes to obtain by his moderate charges at the present time.”

Red Lion Square, Holborn, was called after an inn known as the Red Lion. “Andrew Marvell lies interred under y^e pews in the south side of St Giles church in y^e Fields, under the window wherein is painted on glasse, a red lyon, (it was given by the Innholder of the Red lyon Inne, Holborn.)”*

Another celebrated tavern was the Old Red Lion, St John's Road, Islington,—which has been honoured by the presence of several great literary characters. Thomson, of the “Seasons,” was a frequent visitor; Paine, the author of the “Rights of Man,” lived here; and Dr Johnson, with his friends, are said often to have sat in the parlour. Hogarth introduced its gable end in his picture of Evening.

The BLACK LION is somewhat uncommon; it may have been derived from the coat of arms of Queen Philippa of Hainault, wife of Edward III.† We find an example of it in the following advertisement:—‡

“A T THE UNION SOCIETY at the Black Lion against Short's Garden in Drury Lane, a Linen Draper's, on Thursday the 21st past, was

* Aubrey, iii. 438.

† Owen Glendower also bore a lion rampant sable, “the black lion of Powyss;” his arms were Paly of eight, arg. and gules, over all a lion sable. The black lion was the royal ensign of his father Madoc ap Meredith, last sovereign prince of Powyss; he died at Winchester in 1160. The black lion consequently might sometimes be set up by Welshmen.

‡ Daily Courant, January 1, 1711.

opened three offices of Insurance on the birth of Children, by way of dividend At the same place there is two offices for marriages," &c.

In this advertisement we touch upon the joint-stock mania then raging. Newspapers of the time teemed with advertisements of insurance companies of all sorts: the above paper, with less than a dozen advertisements, offers four schemes, by which on payment of 10s. per week £1000 were eventually to be received!

Among the badges of the Tudors, Henry VII. and Henry VIII. left us the still common sign of the PORTCULLIS.

"A portecullis, or porte-coulisse, is French for that wooden instrument or machine, plated over with iron, made in the form of a harrow or lozenge, hung up with pullies in the entries of gates or castles, to be let down upon any occasion."—Antia Garter.

It is the principal charge in the arms of the city of Westminster, and is to be seen everywhere within and without the beautiful chapel of Henry VII., whose favourite device it was as importing his descent from the house of Lancaster. It was also one of the badges of Henry VIII., with the motto, Securitas Altera, and occurs on some of his coins.

To this same family we also owe the ROSE AND CROWN, which sign, at the present day, may be observed on not less than forty-eight public-houses in London alone, exclusive of beer-houses. One of the oldest is in the High Street, Knightsbridge, which has been licensed above three hundred years, though not under that name, for anciently it was called the OLIVER CROMWELL. The Protector's bodyguard is said to have been quartered here, and an inscription to that effect was formerly painted in front of the house, accompanied by an emblazoned coat of arms of Cromwell, on an ornamental piece of plaster work, which last is all that now remains of it. It is the oldest house in Brompton, was formerly its largest inn, and not improbably the house at which Sir Thomas Wyatt put up, while his Kentish followers rested on the adjacent green. Corbould painted this inn under the title of "The Old Hostelrie at Knightsbridge," exhibited in 1849, but he transferred its date to 1497, altering the house according to his own fancy.

During the persecutions, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, of booksellers suspected as publishers of the mysterious Martin Marprelate tracts, we find one Bogue, at the loyal sign of the Rose and Crown, in St Paul's Churchyard, who fell into the category of the suspected, and who was so severely persecuted that he was almost ruined by it.

One more royal, or rather princely badge remains to be mentioned,—The FEATHERS, PRINCE OF WALES' FEATHERS, occasionally varied to the PRINCE OF WALES' ARMS. Ostrich feathers were from a very early period among the devices of our kings and princes. King Stephen, for instance, according to Guillim, bore a plume of ostrich feathers with the motto :—VI NULLA INVERTITUR ORDO, No force alters their fashion, meaning that no wind can ruffle a feather into lasting disorder. Not only the Black Prince, but also Edward III., himself and his sons, bore ostrich feathers as their cognizances, each with some distinction in colour or metal. The badge originally took the form of a single feather. John Ardern, physician to the Black Prince, who is the first to mention the derivation of the feathers from the King of Bohemia, says :—

"Et nota quod talem pennam albam portabat Edwardus primogenitus filius Edwardi regis super cretam suam, et illam pennam conquisivit de rege Boemiarum, quem interfecit apud Cresse in Francia, et sic assumpsit sibi illam pennam quæ dicitur ostrich feather, quam prius dictus rex nobilissimus portabat super cretam." *

The feather, also, is drawn in the margin of the MS. as single, and in that shape, too, it is represented on the Black Prince's tomb. This feather, however, appears only to have been an ornament on the helmet of King John of Bohemia. A contemporary Flemish poem, quoted by Baron van Reiffenberg, thus describes his heraldic crest :—

"Twee ghiervogelen daer aen geleyt
Die al vol bespringelt zyn
Met Linden bladeren gult fyn,
Deze is, as in merken kan
Van Bohemen Koninck Jan." †

And in that shape it also occurs on the King's seal. More difficulties are offered by the motto : HOU MOET ICH DIEN, for so it is in full,—the Black Prince himself wrote it after this fashion in a letter dated April 25, 1370. The last two words in German mean "I serve," but no explanation is given of the remainder, "Hou moet." Since no mottos in two languages occur, we must

* "And observe that such a white feather was borne on his crest by Edward the eldest son of K. Edward; and this feather he conquered from the King of Bohemia whom he killed at Cressy in France, and so he assumed the feather, called the ostrich feather, which that most noble king had formerly worn on his crest."—Sloane MSS. No. 58.

† Added to this were two vultures, sprinkled all over with finely-gilt linden leaves. Therefore I know this is King John of Bohemia.

look for a language which can account for both parts of the motto; and thus in Flemish we find these words to mean, "Keep courage, I serve," or, in less concise language, "Keep courage, I serve with you, I am your companion in arms;" and though no parentage has as yet been found for this motto, it may not improbably have been derived from the Black Prince's maternal family, since his mother, Queen Philippa of Hainault, was a Flemish princess.

Amongst the many shops which took the feathers for their sign we find the following noted in an advertisement :—

"THE LATE Countess of Kent's powder has been lately experimented upon divers infected persons with admirable success. The virtues of it against the Plague and all malignant distempers are sufficiently known to all the Physicians of Christendom, and the Powder itself prepared by the only person living that has the true Receipt, is to be had at the third part of the ordinary price at Mr Calvert's, at the Feathers in the old Pall Mall near St James's," &c.

This, and other advertisements announcing equally efficacious panacea, appeared daily in the London papers during the plague of 1665. De Foe, in his little chronicle of the plague, often speaks of these quack medicines.

Less dismal images are called up by "the Feathers at the side of Leicester Fields," which sign was evidently complimentary to its neighbour Frederick, Prince of Wales, son of George II., who lived at Leicester House, "the pouting house of princes," when on bad terms with his father, and died there in 1751. The back parlour of this tavern was for some years the meeting-place of a club of artists and well-known amateurs, amongst whom Stuart, the Athenian traveller; Scott, the marine painter; Luke Sullivan, the miniature artist, engraver of the March to Finchley; burly Captain Grose, author of the "Antiquities of England," and the greatest wit of his day; Mr Hearne, the antiquary; Nathaniel Smith, the father of J. T. Smith; Mr John Ireland, then a watchmaker in Maidenlane, and afterwards editor of Boydell's edition of Dr Trusler's "Hogarth Moralised," and several others. When this house was taken down to make way for Dibdin's theatre, called the Sans-souci, the club adjourned to the COACH AND HORSES, in Castle Street, Leicester Fields. But, in consequence of the members not proving customers sufficiently expensive for that establishment, the landlord one evening venturing to let them out with a farthing candle, they betook themselves to Gerard Street and thence to the BLUE Posts in Dean Street, where the club dwindled to two or three members and at last died out.

An amusing anecdote is told about the Feathers, Grosvenor Street West. A lodge of Oddfellows was held at this house, into the private chamber of which George, Prince of Wales, one night intruded very abruptly with a roystering friend. The society was, at the moment, celebrating some of its awful mysteries, which no uninitiated eye may behold, and these were witnessed by the profane intruders. The only way to repair the sacrilege was to make the Prince and his companion "Oddfellows," a title they certainly deserved as richly as any members of the club. The initiatory rites were quickly gone through, and the Prince was chairman for the remainder of the evening. In 1851 the old public-house was pulled down and a new gin palace built on its site, in the parlour of which the chair used by the distinguished Oddfellow is still preserved, along with a portrait of his Royal Highness in the robes of the order.

Among the badges and arms of countries and towns, the national emblem the ROSE is most frequent, and has been so for centuries. Bishop Earle observes, "If the vintner's Rose be at the door it is sign sufficient, but the absence of this is supplied by the ivy-bush." Hutton, in his "Battle of Bosworth," says that "upon the death of Richard III., and the consequent overthrow of the York faction, all the signboards with white roses were pulled down, and that none are to be found at the present day." This last part of the statement, we believe, is true, but that the White Roses were not all immediately done away with appears from the fact that, in 1503, a White Rose Tavern was demolished to make room for the building of Henry VII.'s chapel in Westminster; that tavern stood near the chapel of Our Lady, behind the high altar of the abbey church. At present, however, as the rose on the signboard represents in the eye of the public simply the Queen of Flowers,—its heraldic history having been forgotten long ago,—it is painted any colour according to taste, or occasionally gilt. Long after the famous battles between the White and Red Roses had ceased, the custom was continued of adding the colour to the name of the sign. Thus, in Stow, "Then have ye one other lane called Rother Lane, or Red Rose Lane, of such a sign," &c. In Lancashire we meet, in one or two instances, with the old heraldic flower, as at Springwood, Chaderton, Manchester, where the RED ROSE OF LANCASTER is still in full bloom on a publican's signboard.

Skelton's "Armony of Byrdes" was "imprynted at Londo' by John Wyght dwelling in Poule's Church yarde at the sygne of the Rose." Machyn, in his Diary, mentions many instances:—"The vij day of Aprill (1563) at seint Katheryns beyond the Toure, the wyff of the syne of the Rose, a tavarne, was set on the pelere for ettyng of rowe flesse and rostyde boyth," which in our modern English means that she was put in the pillory for breaking fast in Lent.

The Rose Tavern in Russell Street, Covent Garden, was a noted place for debauchery in the seventeenth century; constant allusions are made to it in the old plays. "In those days a man could not go from the Rose Tavern to the Piazzis once but he must venture his life twice."—Shadwell, the Scurvers, 1691. "Oh no, never talk on't. There will never be his fellow. Oh! had you seen him scower as I did; oh! so delicately, so like a gentleman! How he cleared the Rose Tavern!"—Ibid. In this house, November 14, 1712, the duel between the Duke of Hamilton and Lord Mohun was arranged, in which the latter was killed. In the reign of Queen Anne the place was still a great resort for loose women; hence in the "Rake Reformed," 1718—

"Not far from thence appears a pendant sign,
Whose bush declares the product of the vine,
Where to the traveller's sight the full-blown Rose
Its dazzling beauties doth in gold disclose,
And painted faces flock in tallied cloaths."

Hogarth has represented one of the rooms of the house in his "Rake's Progress." In 1766 this tavern was swallowed up in the enlargements of Drury Lane by Garrick, but the sign was preserved and hung up against the front wall, between the first and second floor windows.*

Two other Roses, not without thorns, are mentioned by Tom Brown:—

"Between two Roses down I fell,
As 'twixt two stools a platter;
One held me up exceeding well,
Th' other did no such matter.
The Rose by Temple Bar gave wine
Exchanged for chalk, and filled me,
But being for the ready coin,
The Rose in Wood Street killed me."

The "Rose by Temple Bar" stood at the corner of Thanet Place. Strype says it was "a well customed house, with good conveniences of rooms and a good garden." Walpole mentions a painted room in this tavern in his letters of January 26 and March 1, 1776. The Rose in Wood Street was a spunging-house : "I have been too lately under their [the Bayliffs'] clutches, to desire any more dealings with them, and I cannot come within a furlong of the Rose spunging-house without five or six yellow boys in my pocket to cast out those devils there, who would otherwise infallibly take possession of me."—Tom Brown's Works, iii. p. 24.

* See the engraving in Pennant's History of London, vol. i. p. 100.

X Innumerable other Rose inns and taverns might be mentioned, but we will conclude with noting the Rose Inn at Wokingham, once famous as the resort of Pope and Gay. There was a room here called "Pope's room," and a chair was shown in which the great little man had sat. It is also celebrated in the well-known song of Molly Mog, attributed to Gay, and printed in Swift's "Miscellanies." "This cruel fair, who was daughter of John Mog, the landlord of that inn, died a spinster at the age of 67. Mr Standen of Arborfield, who died in 1730, is said to have been the enamoured swain to whom the song alludes. The current tradition of the place is, that Gay and his poetic friends having met upon some occasion to dine at the Rose, and being detained within doors by the weather, it was proposed that they should write a song, and that each person present should contribute a verse : the subject proposed was the Fair Maid of the Inn. It is said that by mistake they wrote in praise of Molly, but that in fact it was intended to apply to her sister Sally, who was the greater beauty. A portrait of Gay still remains at the inn."* The house at present is changed into a mercer's shop.

Sometimes the Rose is combined with other objects, as the ROSE AND BALL, which originated in the Rose as the sign of a mercer, and the Ball as the emblem or device which silk dealers formerly hung at their doors like the Berlin wool shops of the present day. (See under Ball.) The ROSE AND KEY was a sign in Cheapside in 1682.† This combination looks like a hieroglyphic rendering of the phrase, "under the rose," but the key is of very common occurrence in other signs, as will be seen presently.

The Scotch THISTLE AND CROWN is another not uncommon national badge, adopted mostly by publicans of North British origin. The CROWN AND HARP is less frequent ; there is one at Bishop's Cleeve, Cheltenham. Of the CROWN AND LEEK we know only one example, viz., in Dean Street, Mile End; but since both the rose and thistle are crowned, why not the leek also? It is "a wholesome food," according to Fluellen, and would no doubt look just as well under a crown as in a Welshman's cap. The SHAMROCK also is of common occurrence, but we have never seen it combined with the Crown.

* Lyson's Berkshire, vol. i. p. 442.

† London Gazette, Sept. 18-21, 1682.

Among heraldic signs referring to towns are the BIBLE AND THREE CROWNS, the coat of arms of Oxford, which was not uncommon with the booksellers in former times. To one of them, probably, belonged the carved stone specimen walled up in a house at the corner of Little Distaff Lane and St Paul's Churchyard. Such a sign is also mentioned in a rather curious advertisement in the Postboy, September 27, 1711:—

"THIS IS to give notice That ten Shillings over and above the Market price will be given for the Ticket in the £1,500,000 Lottery, No. 132, by Nath. Cliff at the Bible and Three Crowns in Cheapside."

The Spectator in his 191st number took occasion from this advertisement to write a very amusing paper on the various lottery superstitions with regard to numbers.

There is also an OXFORD ARMS Inn in Warwick Lane, Newgate Street; a fine, old, galleried inn, with exterior staircases leading to the bed-rooms. This was already a carriers' inn before the fire, as appears from the following advertisement:—

"THESE ARE to give notice, that Edward Barlet, Oxford Carrier, hath removed his Inn in London from the Swan at Holborn Bridge, to the Oxford Arms in Warwick Lane, where he did inne before the fire. His coaches and waggons going forth on their usual days, Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays. He hath also a hearse with all things convenient to carry a corpse to any part of England." *

The BUCK IN THE PARK, Curzon Street, Derby, is the vernacular rendering of the arms of that town, which are—a hart cumbant on a mount, in a park pale, all proper. The THREE LEGS was the sign of a bookseller named Thomas Cockerill, over against Grocer's Hall, in the Poultry, about 1700. Sometimes his house is designated on his publications as the THREE LEGS AND BIBLE. These three legs were the Manx arms. It is still a not uncommon alehouse sign. There is one, for instance, in Call Lane, Leeds, which is known to the lower classes under the jocular denomination of "the kettle with three spouts."

County arms also are sometimes represented on the signboards; as the FIFTEEN BALLS, (which refer to the Cornish arms, fifteen roundles arranged in triangular form) at Union Street, Bodmin, Cornwall; ONE AND ALL, the motto of the county of Cornwall, occurs at Cheapside, St Heliers, Jersey; and in Market Jew Street, Penzance. This motto has, besides the advantage of being a hearty appeal to all the thirsty sons of Bacchus, and will call to the mind of a thoughtful toper, the relative position of one and many, or all, as explained by the al-fresco artists, who decorate the pavement in Piccadilly—"Many can help one, one cannot help many." The STAFFORDSHIRE KNOT is common in the pottery districts; besides these almost every county is represented by its own arms, such as the NORTHUMBERLAND ARMS, &c., but about these nothing need be said.

* London Gazette, March 12, 1672-3.

The THREE BALLS of the pawnbrokers are taken from the lower part of the coat of arms of the Dukes of Medici, from whose states, and from Lombardy, nearly all the early bankers came. These capitalists also advanced money on valuable goods, and hence gradually became pawnbrokers. The arms of the Medici family were five bezants azure, whence the balls formerly were blue, and only within the last half century have assumed a golden exterior, evidently to gild the pill for those who have dealings with "my uncle;" as for the position in which they are placed, the popular explanation is that there are two chances to one that whatever is brought there will not be redeemed.

The LION AND CASTLE, of which there are a few instances, (Cherry Garden Stairs, Rotherhithe, for example,) need not be derived from royal marriage alliances with Spain, as it may simply have been borrowed from the brand of the Spanish arms on the sherry casks, and have been put up by the landlord to indicate the sale of genuine Spanish wines, such as sack, canary, mountain.

The FLOWER DE LUCE was a frequent English sign in old times, either taken from the quartering of the French arms with the English, or set up as a compliment to private families who bear this charge in their arms or as crest. The preface of "Edyth, the lying widow," ends with these words:—

" In the cyte of Exeter by West away
The time not passed hence many a day,
There dwelled a yoman discret and wise,
At the siggne of the Flower de lyse
Which had to name John Hawkyn."

Tokens are extant of an inn at Dover, in the seventeenth century, with the sign of the FRENCH ARMS, a tavern name sufficiently com-

PLATE VII.

HEDGEHOG.
(Bynnevan's sign, 1360.)

BLUE BOAR.
(Banks's Collection, 1765.)

THE VALIANT LONDON APPRENTICE.
(From an old chapbook, 17th cent.)

THE SUN.
(Sign of Wyukyn de Worde, 1497.)

THREE PHEASANTS AND SCEPTER.
(Banks's Bills, 1796.)

mon also in London at that period to attract the travellers from across the Channel. Thus James Johnson was a goldsmith, "that kept running cash,"—i.e., a banker,—in Cheapside, in 1677, living at the sign of the THREE FLOWER DE LUCES.* In the fifteenth century, Gascon merchants and other strangers in London were allowed to keep hostels for their countrymen, and, in order to get known, they most likely put up the arms of those countries as their signs. No doubt the THREE FROGS, London Road, Wokingham, is a travesty of Johnny Crapaud's Arms.

Boursault,† in his letter to Bizotin, has a burst of indignation at a "fournisseur" of something or other to the royal family, who had adopted as his sign the ENGLISH ARMS, with the arms of France in the first quarter, and endeavours to call down the ire of the Parisian police upon the head of the unfortunate shopkeeper who had committed this act of treason:—

"Laissons l'Angleterre se repaître de chimères," saith he, "et s'imaginer que ses souverains sont Rois de France, mais que des Français soyent assez ignorants, ou assez mauvais sujets, pour mettre les armes de France écartelées dans celles d'Angleterre, c'est ce que des sujets aussi zélés que Monsieur d'Argenson et les autres officiers préposés pour la police ne doivent nullement souffrir."‡

He next, in a threatening manner, reminds the poor shopkeeper how, according to "Candem [sic] Historien Angloys," Queen Mary Stuart was beheaded for having quartered the English arms with those of Scotland, though she was the heir-presumptive of the English throne; and if such was the fate of that queen, what then did the man deserve who quartered the arms of his sovereign with those of a foreign king? Indeed he deserved the same fate as the arms.

Another sign, apparently of French origin, is the DOLPHIN AND CROWN, the armorial bearing of the French Dauphin, and the sign of R. Willington, a bookseller in St Paul's Churchyard circa 1700. Some years after, this house seems to have been occupied by James Young, a famous maker of violins and other musical instruments, who lived at the west corner of London

* Little London Directory for 1677, the oldest printed lists of bankers and merchants in London, reprinted, with historical introduction by John Camden Hotten, 1863.

† A very amusing French author of the time of Louis XIV., celebrated for his witty letters.

‡ "Let England amuse herself with idle fancies, and imagine that her kings are kings of France; but that there be Frenchmen who are ignorant enough, or bad subjects enough, to quarter the arms of France with those of England, that is a thing which such zealous subjects as M. d'Argenson, and the other police magistrates, ought by no means to permit."

House Yard, St Paul's Churchyard. On this man the following catch appeared in the Pleasant Muscull Companion, 1726 :—

"You scrapers that want a good fiddle well strung,
 You must go to the man that is old while he's Young;
 But if this same fiddle you fain would play bold,
 You must go to his son, who's Young when he's old.
 There's old Young and young Young, both men of renown:
 Old sells and young plays the best fiddle in town.
 Young and old live together, and may they live long—
 Young to play an old fiddle, old to sell a new song."

This Young family afterwards removed to the QUEEN'S HEAD Tavern in Paternoster Row, where in a few years they grew rich by giving concerts, when they removed to the CASTLE in the same street. The Castle concerts continued a long time to be celebrated.

Many signs are exceedingly puzzling under the name by which they pass with the public. Such was that of "Rowland Hall, dwelling in Guttur Lane, at the sygne of the HALF EAGLE AND KEY." This quaint sign is no other than the arms of Geneva, described in the non-heraldic language of the mob. Rowland Hall, a bookseller and printer, lived as a refugee in Geneva during the reign of Queen Mary; hence on his return to London he set up the arms of that town for his sign, as a graceful compliment to the hospitality he had received, and as a tribute of admiration to stanch Protestantism. Hall, at other periods of his life, lived at the CRADLE in Lombard Street, and at the THREE ARROWS in Golden Lane, Cripplegate. In 1769 there was again the GENEVA ARMS among the London signs, before the shop of Le Grand, a "pastery-cook and cook," as he styled himself, in Church Street, Soho. Formerly most pastry-cooks and confectioners were Swiss, and many from that country still follow those professions in Italy, Spain, and recently in England. This last sign has found imitators in Soho; for at the present day it figures at a public-house in Hayes Court, where it is put up, no doubt, in honour of the spirit which many call Geneva, but which we may name Gin. The origin of this name, as applied by publicans, is not a little curious. In Holland the juniper-berry is used for flavouring the gin or hollands which they distil there, and this, with the vulgar in that country, has gradually become corrupted from Juniper to Jenever, the latter term being still further corrupted here to Geneva, and Gin.

The CROSS KEYS are the arms of the Papal See, the emblem of St Peter and his successors:—

"Two massy keys he bore, of metals twain;
The golden opes, the iron shuts amaine."

MILTON.

This sign was frequently adopted by innkeepers and other tenants of religious houses, even after the Reformation; for the Cross Keys figure in the arms of the Bishops of York, Cashel, Exeter, Gloster, and Peterborough. At the Cross Keys in Gracechurch Street, where Tarlton, the comic actor, went to see fashions, Banks used to perform with his wonderful bay horse before a crowded house. This was in the days of Queen Elizabeth, when the inn consisted of a large court with galleries all round, which, like many other old London inns, was often used as an extempore theatre by our ancestors. It is named in 1681* amongst the carriers' inns, and is in existence at the present day. The Cross Keys was the sign of a tavern near Thavies Inn in 1712:—

"May the Cross Keys near Thavies Inn succeed,
And famous grow for choicest white and red;
That all may know, who view that costly sign,
Those golden keys command celestial wine."

The Quack Vintners. A Satire. 1712.

Besides, it is famous as the sign of Bernard Lintot, 1736, the publisher of Gay's works, and many other popular books of that day. His shop was situated between the Temple Gates, in Fleet Street. The CROSS KEYS AND BIBLE was the sign of J. Bell, in Cornhill, 1711.

Most numerous among heraldic signs were the crests, arms, and badges† of private families. The causes which dictated the

* Thos. Delaune's Present State of London, 1681.

† These badges consisted of the master's arms, crest, or device, either on a small silver shield or embroidered on a piece of cloth, and fastened on the left arm of servants. A ballad in the Roxburgh collection thus alludes to this custom:—

"The nobles of our Land were much delighted then,
To have at their command
a Crue of lustie Men,
Which by their Coats were knowne,
of Tawnie, Red, or Blue;
With crests on their sleeves showne when this old cap was new."

* "Time's alteration ;

or,

The old man's rehearsal what brave days he knew
A great while ago, when his old cap was new."

Rox. Ball., i. fol. 407.

choice of such subjects were various. One of the earliest was this :—

"In towns the hospitality of the burghers was not always given gratis, for it was a common custom even amongst the richer merchants to make a profit by receiving guests. These letters of lodgings were distinguished from the innkeepers or hostelers by the name of herbergeors, or people who gave harbour to strangers, and in large towns they were submitted to municipal regulations. The great barons and knights were in the custom of taking up their lodgings with those herbergeors rather than going to the public hostel, and thus a sort of relationship was formed between particular nobles or kings and particular burghers, on the strength of which the latter adopted the arms of their habitual lodgers as their sign."*

This, again, led to the custom of prefixing to inns the arms of men of note who had sojourned in the house, as may be seen in Machyn's Diary :—"The xxv day of January [1560] toke ys gorney into Franse, inbassadur to the Frenche kyng, the yerle of Bedford and he had iij dozen of logyng skochyons," (lodging escutcheons). Thus, on the road from London to Westchester the coats of arms of several of the lord-lieutenants of Ireland might formerly have been observed, either as signs to inns or else framed and hung in the best rooms. That this was a general custom with ambassadors appears from Sir Dudley Digge's "Compleat Ambssador," 1654; who, alluding in his preface to the reserve of English ambassadors, observes :—"We have hardly any notion of them but their arms, which are hung up in inns where they passed." Montaigne also mentions this practice as usual in France :—"A Plombières il me commanda à la faveur de son hostesse, selon l'humeur de la nation, de laisser un escusson de ses armes en bois, qu'un peintre dudict lieu fist pour un escu; et le fist l'hostesse curieusement attacher à la muraille pas dehors."†

But the feudal relations between the higher and lower classes contributed above all to the adoption of this description of signs. A vassal, for instance, would set up the arms or crest of his

Stow gives us a good picture of a great nobleman's retinue in the good old time, before the nobility took to hotel-keeping :—"The late Earl of Oxford, father to him that now liveth, has been noted within these forty years, to have ridden into this city and so to his house by London Stone, with eighty gentlemen, in a livery of Reading tawny, and chains of gold about their necks, before him, and one hundred tall yeomen in the like livery to follow him, without chains, but all having his cognisance of the blue boar embroidered on their left shoulder." These badges fell into disuse in the reign of James I.

* Wright's Domestic Manners and Sentiments in England during the Middle Ages, p. 333.

† "At Plombières he ordered me to leave with his hostess, according to the fashion of the country, an escutcheon of his arms in wood, which a painter of that town made for a crown; and the hostess had it carefully hung upon the wall outside the house."

feudal lord; a retired soldier the arms of the knight under whose banneret he had gathered both glory and plunder; an old servant the badge he had worn when he stood at the trencher, or followed his master in the chase; and, doubtless, many publicans adopted for their sign the badge of the neighbouring wealthy noble, in order to court the custom of his household and servants.

Bagford, in his MS. notes about the art of printing,* has jotted down a list of signs originated from badges, which we will transcribe in all the unrestrained freedom of Bagford's spelling, in which, as well as in bad writing, he surpassed all his contemporaries, (see note, p. 102):—

"Then for ye original of signes used to be set over ye douers of tradesmen, as Inkepers, Taverns, etc., thay hauing been domestic saruants to some nobleman, thay leauing ther Masters saruis toke to themselves for ther signes ye crest, bag,† or ye arms of ther Ld., and thes was a destincion or Mark of one Mannes house from anouther, and [not] only by printers but all outhter trades: and these seruants of kinges, queenes, or noblemen, being ther domestick saruants, and wor ther Leuirs‡ and Bages, as may be sene these day ye maner of the Leuirs and Bagges by ye wattermen:—

The ANTELOP was ye bag of Kg. Henery ye 8, as wel as ye porculouses§ and ye Rose and Crown.

ANCOB, Gould, ye Ld. of Lincolne and ye Lord High Admirall.

BULL, Black, with gould hornes, ye House of Clarence.

BULL, Dun, ye Lord Nevill, Westmoreland, Burgayne, Latimer, and Southamton.

BOUR: White, ye Lord Winsor; Blew with a Mullit, ye Earle of Oxford.

BUCKET and CHANE, ye Lord Wills.

BARE and RAGGED STAFFE, ye Earle of Lester.

BARE, Black, ye Earle of Warwicke.

BARE, White, ye Earle of Kent.

BEARS HEAD Muscled, ye Lord Morley.

ROE BUCK, ye Lord Montacute.

BULLS HEAD erased: White, ye Ld. Wharton; Red, ye Lord Ogle.

CRESCENT or HALFE MOUNE, ye Earle of Northumberland and ye Temporalati.

CONDY, black, ye Ld. Bray.

CAT, ye Lord Euers; Cat of Mount and Leper,|| Mar. of Worster and ye Ld. Buckhurst.

CROSSES and MITTERS, and CROSS KEYES, Archbishop and Bishopes, Abbots.

CARDINALES CAPES or HAT, you have not meney of them, the war set up by sune that had ben seruants to Tho. Wollsey.

DRAGON: Black, Wilsher¶ and Clifford; Red, Cumberland; Greone, ye Earle of Pembroke.

* Harl. MSS., 5910, vol. II. p. 167.

‡ Portcullises.

† Badge.
|| Leopard.

‡ Liveries.
¶ Wiltshire.

EAGLE, ye Earle of Cambridge; EAGEL AND CHILDE, ye Earle of Derby; Black, ye Lord Norris.

EAGLE, sprede, ye Emperour.

ELEPHANT, Sr. Ffrances Knowles, (and Henery Wyke, a printer, liuing in Fletstrete, 1570, was saruant to Sr. Ffr. Knowles, gaue ye Elephant for his signe,) and likewise it was ye bag of ye Lord Beaumont and ye Ld. Sandes.

PHENIX, ye Lord Hertford, and ye sign that — Mansell [set up,] Copper, etc.*

FFOX, Red, Gloster and ye Bishop of Winchester.

FFALCOOLNE, ye Marquesse of Winchester; armed and collered, ye Ld. St John and Ld. Zouch.

GRIPES FFOOT, ye Ld. Stanley.

GOTTE, ye Earle of Bedford.

GRATHOND, ye Ld. Clenton, Druery, and ye Lord Rich.†

GRIFFEN, ye Ld. Wintworth.

HARPE, for Irland.

HEDGE-HOG, Sr. Henery Sidney; Will. Seeres was his printer.

HIND, Sr. Christopher Haton; Hen. Beneyman his printer.

LOOK, ye House of Suffolcke. Such a sign without Temple Bar.

LION, Bleu, Denmarke.

LION, Red, Rampant, Scotland.

LION, White, Pasant, ye Earl of March.

LION, White, Rampant, Norfolk and all ye Hawardes.

MAIDEN HEAD, ye Duck of Buckingham.

PORTCULLIS, ye Earle of Somerset, Wayles, and ye Lord of Worster.

THE PYE, ye Ld. Reuiera.‡

PELICAN, ye Lord Cromwell.

PECOCKE, ye Earle of Rutland.

PLUM OF FFEATHERS, ye Earle of Lincolne; azure, ye Lord Scrope.

RAUEN, White, ye Earle of Comberland.

RAUEN, Blacke, ye King of Scots.

SWANE, ye Ducke of Buckingham, Gloster, Hartford, Hunsdon, Stafford.

SUNE, ye Spirituallaty, ye Lord Willoby and York.

STAFFE: White Ragged, Warwick; Black, Kent.

STARRE, ye Earle of Sussen and ye Lord Fitzwalter.

SARASON HEAD, ye Ld. Audley and ye Ld. Cobham.

TALBOT, ye Earl of Shrewsbury and ye Lord Mountagew.

TIGER'S HEAD, Sr. Ffrancis Walsingham.

WHITE-SHEAFE, ye Earle of Exeter, ye Lord Burley, etc.

AFE, clogged, ye House of Suffolcke.

BUTTERFLIE, white, ye Lord Audle.

CAMEL, ye Earle of Worster.

YE 3 FLUER DE LUSES, ye King of France.

FOOLES HEAD, ye Earle of Bath.

GRATHOND, ye Ld. Clinton; white, ye fameley of ye Druries.

* A transcript adds to these the names of Archbishop Parker and Juge.

† This statement is modified lower down.

‡ Rivera.

inn outside the castle. As in all cases of public resort, people soon began to have fancies, and this Red Lion and that Greyhound became famous through the country for the good entertainment to be had there. In this manner Red Lions and Greyhounds found their way on to the signboards of the inns within the walled cities. The men of the castle, too, used those houses bearing their master's arms when they visited the town. It will be readily seen that the name of a favourite tavern would quickly suggest its adoption elsewhere, and in this way the heraldic emblem of a family might be carried where that family was neither known nor feared.

Latterly, however, as all traces of the origin and meaning of these "Arms" have died out, or become removed from the understanding of publicans and brewers, the uses to which the word has been applied are most absurd and ridiculous. Not only do we meet constantly with arms of families nobody ever heard of, nor cares to hear about, but all sorts of impossible "Arms" are invented, as JUNCTION ARMS, GRIFFIN'S ARMS, CHAFFCUTTER'S ARMS, UNION ARMS,* GENERAL'S ARMS, ANTIGALLICAN ARMS, FARMERS' ARMS, DROVERS' ARMS, &c., (see Introduction.)

In tavern heraldry the ADAM'S ARMS ought certainly to have the precedence: the publicans generally represent these by a pewter pot and a couple of crossed tobacco pipes, differing in this from Sylvanus Morgan, a writer on heraldry, who says that Adam's arms were "Paly Tranchy divided every way and tinctured of every colour."† The shield was in the shape of a spade, which was used

"When Adam delved and Eve span," whilst from the spindle of our first mother the female lozenge-shaped shield is said to be derived.

One of the most popular heraldic signs is the BEAR AND RAGGED STAFF, the crest of the Warwick family:—

* The UNION ARMS in Pantion Street, Haymarket, was the public-house of Cribb, the pugilist champion, a fact commemorated by a poet of the prize ring, in all probability a better "fist" at smashing than at "wooing the Muses":—

"The champion I see is again on the list,
His standard—the UNION ARMS.
His customers still he will serve with his fist,
But without creating alarms.
Instead of a floorer, he tips them a glass,
Divested of joking or fib;
Then, 'lads of the fancy,' don't Tom's house pass,
But take a hand at the game of Cribb."

† Sylvanus Morgan's Sphere of Gentry. London, 1661.

riers' inn in West Smithfield possessed this sign in 1682.* In the wall of a house at the corner of Little St Andrew Street and West Street, St Giles, there is still a stone bas-relief sign of two ragged staves placed salterwise, with the initials S. F. G., and the date 1691. It was doubtless put there as a compliment to Robert Sydney, Earl of Leicester, who in the reign of Charles II. built Leicester House, which gave a name to Leicester Fields, now the site of Leicester Square. Stow mentions that the king-maker, Richard Warwick, came to town for the convention of 1458, accompanied by 600 men, all in red jackets, "embroidered with ragged staves before and behind."

Equally well known with the last sign is that of the EAGLE AND CHILD, occasionally called the BIRD AND BANTLING, to obtain the favourite alliteration. It represents the crest of the Stanley family, and the following legend is told to account for its origin:—In the reign of Edward III., Sir Thomas Latham, ancestor of the house of Stanley and Derby, had only one legitimate child, a daughter named Isabel, but at the same time he had an illegitimate son by a certain Mary Oscatell. This child he ordered to be laid at the foot of a tree on which an eagle had built its nest. Taking a walk with his lady over the estate, he contrived to bring her past this place, pretended to find the boy, took him home, and finally prevailed upon her to adopt him as their son. This boy was afterwards called Sir Oscatell Latham, and considered the heir to the estates. Compunction or other motive, however, made the old nobleman alter his mind and confess the fraud, and at his death the greater part of the fortune was left to his daughter, who afterwards married Sir John Stanley. At the adoption of the child, Sir Thomas had assumed for crest an eagle looking backwards; this, out of ill feeling towards Sir Oscatell, was afterwards altered into an eagle preying upon a child. How matters were afterwards arranged may be seen in "Memoirs containing a Genealogical and Historical Account of the House of Stanley," p. 22. Manchester, 1767. Bishop Stanley made an historical poem upon the legend, which is not without parallel, and seems to be either a corruption of or suggested by the fable of Ganymede. Edward Stanley, in his "History of Birds," (vol. i. p. 119,) cites several similar stories. But the Stanley family is not the only one that bears this crest. Randle Holme (b. iii. p. 403) gives the arms of the family of

* Delaune's Present State of London, 1682.

Culcheth of Culcheth as "an infant in swaddling-clothes proper, mantle gules, swaddle band or, with an eagle standing upon it, with its wings expanded sable in a field argent." "The fause fable of the Lo. Latham" is also told at length, with slight variations from the usual story, in a MS. in the College of Arms;* in this version the foundling is made the son of an Irish king. The Eagle and Child occurs as the sign of a bookseller, Thomas Creede, in the old Exchange, as early as 1584. Taylor the water-poet also names some instances of the sign among inns and taverns, and particularly extols one at Manchester:—

"I lodged at the Eagle and the Child,
Whereas my hostesse (a good ancient woman)
Did entertain me with respect not common,
She caused my linnen, shirts, and bands be washt,
And on my way she caused me be refresht;
She gave me twelve silke points, she gave me baken,
Which by me much refused at last was taken.
In troath she proued a mother unto me,
For which I ever more will thankfull be."†

Another crest of the Derby family also occurs as a sign—namely, the EAGLE'S FOOT, which was adopted in the sixteenth century by John Tysdall, a bookseller at the upper end of Lombard Street.

The frequency of eagles in heraldry made them very common on the signboard, although it is now impossible to say whose armorial bearings each particular eagle was intended to represent. The SPREAD EAGLE occurs as the sign of one of the early printers and booksellers, Gualter Lynne, who, in the middle of the sixteenth century, had two shops with that sign,—one on Sommer's Key, near Billingsgate, and another next St Paul's Wharf. In 1659 there was a BLACK SPREAD EAGLE at the west end of St Paul's, which shop was also a bookseller's, one Giles Calvert. As the signs in large towns and cities were generally not altered when the house changed hands, it is not improbable but that this may be the same Black Eagle mentioned by Stow in the following words:—

"During a great tempest at sea, in January 1506, Philip, King of Castille, and his queen, were weather-driven at Falmouth. The same tempest blew down the Eagle of brass off the spire of St Paul's Church in London, and in the falling the same eagle broke and battered the Black Eagle that hung for a sign in St Paul's Churchyard."

Milton's father, a scrivener by trade, lived in Bread Street,

* Printed in the Journal of Brit. Archaeolog. Assoc., vol. vii. p. 71.

† Taylor's Pennyisse Pilgrimage, 1630.

Cheapside, at the sign of the Spread Eagle, which was his own coat of arms, and in this house the great author of "Paradise Lost" was born, December 9, 1608. When the poet's fame had gone forth, strangers used to come to see the house, until it was destroyed by the fire of 1666. Perhaps its memory is preserved in Black Spread Eagle Court, which is the name of a passage in that locality.

Another Spread Eagle was a noted "porter-house" in the Strand at the end of the last century:—

"And to some noted porter-house repair;
The several streets or one or more can claim,
Alike in goodness and alike in fame.
The Strand her Spreading Eagle justly boasts.

Facing that street where Venus holds her reign,
And Pleasure's daughters drag a life of pain,*
There the Spread Eagle, with majestic grace,
Shows his broad wings and notifies the place.

There let me dine in plenty and in quiet."†

The GRASSHOPPERS on the London signboards were all descendants of Sir Thomas Gresham's sign and crest, which is still commemorated by the weather-vane on the Royal Exchange, of which he was the first founder. The original sign appears to have been preserved up to a very recent date.

"The shop of the great Sir Thomas Gresham," says Pennant, "stood in this [Lombard] street: it is now occupied by Messrs Martin, bankers, who are still in possession of the original sign of that illustrious person—the Grasshopper. Were it mine, that honourable memorial of so great a predecessor should certainly be placed in the most ostentatious situation I could find."‡

The ancients used the grasshopper as a fascinum, (fascination, enchantment;) for this purpose Pisistratus erected one as a xaraxήm before the Acropolis at Athens; hence grasshoppers, in

* Catherine Street, in the Strand, was a disreputable thoroughfare in the last century. Gay alludes to it in his "Trivia":—

"Oh, may thy virtue guard thee through the roads
Of Drury's many courts and dark abodes!
The harlots' gulleful path, who nightly stand
Where Catherine Street descends into the Strand.
With empty handbox she delights to range,
And feigns a distant errand from the 'Change.
Nay, she will oft the Quaker's hood profane,
And trudge demure the rounds of Drury Lane."

Tom Brown describes, con amore, the wickedness of that part of the town. Catherine Street at present is not quite so bad as formerly, but the hundred of Drury Lane cannot by any means be called the most virtuous part of London.

† Art of Living in London. Printed for William Griffin, at the Garrickshead, in Catherine Street, in the Strand, 1768.

‡ Pennant's Account of London, 1818, p. 618.

all sorts of human occupations, were worn about the person to bring good luck. The grasshopper sign certainly seems to have been a lucky one. Charles Duncombe and Richard Kent, goldsmiths, lived at the Grasshopper in Lombard Street, (no doubt Gresham's old house,) in 1677,* and thrived so well under its fascinum that Duncombe gathered a fortune large enough to buy the Helmsley estate in Yorkshire from George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham. The land is now occupied by the Earl of Feversham, (Duncombe's descendant,) under the name of Duncombe Park.

It is impossible to determine whether the MAIDENHEAD was set up as a compliment to the Duke of Buckingham, to Catherine Parr, or to the Mercers' Company, for it is the crest of the three. But at all events the Mercers' crest had the precedence as being the oldest. Amongst the badges of Henry VIII. it is sometimes seen issuing out of the Tudor Rose:—

"This combination," Willement says, "does not appear to have been an entire new fancy, but to have been composed from the rose-badge of King Henry VIII., and from one previously used by this queen's family. The house of Parr had before this time assumed as one of their devices a maiden's head couped below the breast, vested in ermine and gold, the hair of the head and the temples encircled with a wreath of red and white roses; and this badge they had derived from the family of Ros of Kendal."

It was a sign used by some of the early printers. On the last page of a little work entitled "Salus Corporis, Salus Animæ," we find the following imprint:—

"Hos cme Richardus quos Fax impressit ad unguem calcographus summa sedulitate libros.

Impressum est presens opusculum londiniis in divi pauli semiterio sub virginei capitis signo. Anno millesimo quin getesimo nono. Mensis vero Decembris die xii."†

Thomas Petit, another early printer, also lived "at the sygne of the Maydenshead in Paulis Churchyard," 1541. He was probably a successor of Richard Fax.

An amusing anecdote is told of old Hobson, the Londoner, with regard to this sign:—

"Maister Hobson having one of his Prentices new come out of his time, and being made a free man of London, desired to set up for himself; so, taking a house not far from St Laurence Lane, furnished it with store

* Little London Directory for 1677, the oldest list of London merchants.

† "Buy these books, which Richard Fax the printer has printed with the wedge, with the greatest care. This little book was printed at London, in St Paul's Churchyard, at the Maidenhead, in the year 1509, on the 12th of December." The printing with the wedge was the first attempt of the art, whence the books produced in this manner are sometimes called incunables.

of ware, and set up the signe of the Maydenhead; hard by was a very rich man of the same trade, had the same signe, and reported in every place where he came, that the young man had set up the same signe that he had onely to get away his customers, and daily vexed the young man therewithall, who, being grieved in his mind, made it known to Maister Hobson, his late Maister, who, comming to the rich man, said, 'I marvell, sir,' (quoth Maister Hobson,) 'why you wrong my man so much as to say he seketh to get away your customers.' 'Marry, so he doth,' (quoth the other,) 'for he has set up a signe called the Maidenhead, and mine is.' 'That is not so,' (replied Maister Hobson,) 'for his is the widdoe's head, and no maydenhead, therefore you do him great wrong.' The rich man hereupon, seeing himself requited with mocks, rested satisfied, and never after that envied Maister Hobson's man, but let him live quietly." *

This sign occurs occasionally as the MAID'S HEAD, but since Queen Elizabeth's reign it has doubtless frequently referred to the virgin queen.

THE CROSS FOXES—i.e., two foxes counter saliant—is a common sign in some parts of England. It is the sign of the principal inn at Oswestry in Shropshire, and of very many public-houses in North Wales, and has been adopted from the armorial bearings of Sir Watkin Williams Wynne, Bart., whose family hold extensive possessions in these parts. The late baronet, too, made himself very popular as a patron of agricultural improvements. Old Guillim, the heraldic writer's remarks upon this coat of arms, which he says belongs to the Kadrod Hard family of Wales, are quaint:—

"These are somewhat unlike Samson's foxes that were tied together by the tails, and yet these two agree in aliquo tertio: They came into the field like to enemies, but they meant nothing less than fight, and therefore they pass by each other, like two crafty lawyers, which come to the Bar as if they meant to fall out deadly about their clients' cause; but when they have done, and their clients' purses are well spunged, they are better friends than ever they were, and laugh at those geese that will not believe them to be foxes, till they (too late) find themselves foxbitten." †

The TIGER'S HEAD was the sign of the house of Christopher and Robert Barker, Queen Elizabeth's booksellers and printers, in Paternoster Row: it was borrowed from their crest; their shop exhibited the sign of the Grasshopper, in St Paul's Churchyard. They came of an ancient family, being descended from Sir Christopher Barker, knight, king-at-arms, in the reign of Henry VIII. Barker is said to have printed the first series of English news-sheets, or, as we now call them, newspapers. The earliest of those which remain (copies are preserved among Dr Birch's Historical Collections in the British Museum, No. 4106) relate to the descent of the Spanish Armada upon the English coasts; but as they are numbered 50, 51, and 54 in the corner of their upper margins, it has been not improbably concluded that a similar mode of publishing news had been resorted to considerably earlier than the date of that event, though, as far as we know, none of the papers have been preserved. The title is:—

* Pleasant Conceits of old Hobson the Londoner, 1607. Hobson's answer proves the truth of Mison's remark, that there were no inscriptions on the London signs to tell what they represented, otherwise the maid could not have been passed off as a widow.

† Guillim's Display of Heraldry, folio, p. 197.

"THE ENGLISH MERCURIE, published by authoritie, for the prevention of false reports;"

and the last number contains an account of the queen's thanksgiving at St Paul's for the victory she had gained over the enemies of England. It is probable that when the great alarm of the Armada had subsided, no more numbers were published. The colophon runs:—

"Imprinted by Christopher Barker, her highnesse's printer, July 23, 1588."

It must not however be concealed that doubt is entertained of the genuineness of these papers. Two of them are not of the time, but printed in modern type; and no originals are known: the third is in manuscript of the eighteenth century, altered and interpolated with changes in old language, such only as an author would make.

The punning device, or printer's emblem, of Barker was a man barking a tree, representations of which may be seen on the titles and last leaves of many of the old folio and quarto Bibles and New Testaments issued from his press. His descendants continued booksellers to the royal family until January 12, 1645, when Robert Barker, the last of the family, died a prisoner for debt in the King's Bench. His misfortunes were probably occasioned by the embarrassments of his royal master, who for three years had been at war with the Parliament and a majority of his subjects.

Various other booksellers sold their books under the sign of the Tiger's Head in St Paul's Churchyard: apparently they succeeded each other in the same house. Thus we find Toby Cook, 1579-1590; Felix Kingston, 1599; and Henry Seile, 1634.

At Nortwich and Altringham, Chester, there is a sign called the BLEEDING WOLF, which has not been found anywhere else. Its origin is difficult to explain, and the only explanation that can be immediately offered for it is the crest of Hugh Lupus and Richard, first and second Earls of Chester, which was a wolf's head erased; the neck of the animal being erased may, by primitive sign-painters, have been represented less conventionally than is done now, and probably exhibited some of the torn parts, whence the name of the Bleeding Wolf. As for the use of the term "wolf," instead of "wolf's head," we have a parallel instance in one of the gates of Chester, which, from this crest, was called Wolfsgate instead of Wolfshead Gate. There is another equally puzzling sign, peculiar to this county and to Lancashire—namely, the BEAR'S PAW. Of this sign, it must be confessed that no explanation can be offered; it certainly looks heraldic, and lions' jamps erased are the crest of many families.

Easy enough to explain is the sign of PARTA TURRI, (Cellar-head, Staffordshire,) which is the motto of the Lilford family: this is the only instance as yet met with of a family motto standing for a sign; though in Essex a public-house sign, representing a sort of Bacchic coat of arms, with the motto, IN VINO VERITAS, may be seen. The OAKLEY ARMS, at Maidenhead, near Bray, deserves passing mention, on account of some amusing verses connected with the place. As it is frequently the custom with publicans to choose for their sign the name or picture of some real or imaginary hero connected with the locality in which their house stands, the following verses were written on the Oakley Arms, near Bray:—

"Friend Isaac, 'tis strange you that live so near Bray
Should not set up the sign of the Vicar.*
Though it may be an odd one, you cannot but say
It must needs be a sign of good liquor."

Answer:

"Indeed, master Poet, your reason's but poor,
For the Vicar would think it a sin
To stay, like a booby, and lounge at the door,—
'Twere a sign 'twas bad liquor within."

The WENTWORTH ARMS, Kirby Mallory, Leicestershire, may also be mentioned on account of its peculiar inscription, which has a strange moral air about it, as if a pious Boniface drew beer and uncorked wine, and wished to compromise matters on high moral grounds, and limit with puritanical rigidity the government regulation above his door, "to be Drunk on the Premises":—

"May he who has little to spend, spend nothing in drink;
May he who has more than enough, keep it for better uses."

* The Vicar of Bray, the hero of Butler's comic poem, appears to have been a certain Simon Aleyn, ob. 1588; he was by turns, and as the times suited, Roman Catholic and Protestant, in the times of Henry VIII., Edward VI., Queen Mary, and Queen Elizabeth.

Griffin Tavern, on the west side, which has a passage into Fulwood's rents," (Book iii., p. 253.)

The variously-coloured lions come under the same category of heraldic animals. Amongst them the GOLDEN LION stands foremost. A public-house with that sign in Fulham ought not to be passed unnoticed; it is one of the most ancient houses in the village, having been built in the reign of Henry VII. The interior is not much altered; the chimney-pieces are in their original state, and in good preservation. Formerly there were two staircases in the thick walls, but they are now blocked up. Tradition says that the house once belonged to Bishop Bonner, and that it has subterraneous passages communicating with the episcopal palace. When the old hostelry was pulled down in 1836, a tobacco-pipe of ancient and foreign fashion was found behind the wainscot. The stem was a crooked bamboo, and a brass ornament of an Elizabethan pattern formed the bowl of the pipe. This pipe Mr Crofton Croker* tries to identify as the property of Bishop Bonner, who, on the 15th June 1596, died suddenly at Fulham, "while sitting in his chair and smoking tobacco." If Mr Croker be right, this inn should also have been honoured by the presence of Shakespeare, Fletcher, Henry Condell, (Shakespeare's fellow actor,) John Norden, (author of A Description of Middlesex and Hertfordshire,) Florio, the translator of Montaigne, and divers other notabilities.

The BLUE LION is far from uncommon, and may possibly have been first put up at the marriage of James I. with Anne of Denmark. The PURPLE LION occurs but once—namely, on a trades token of Southampton Buildings.

Signs borrowed from Corporation arms form the last subdivision of this chapter. Such, for instance, is the THREE COMPASSES, a change in the arms of both the carpenters and masons. This sign is a particular favourite in London, where not less than twenty-one public-houses make a living under its shadow. Perhaps this is partly owing to the compasses being a masonic emblem, and a great many publicans "worthy brethren." Frequently the sign of the compasses contains between the legs the following good advice:—

"Keep within compass,
And then you'll be sure,

* In 1847, Mr Crofton Croker read a paper at a meeting of the Brit. Arch. Assoc. at Warwick, "On the probability of the Golden Lion Inn at Fulham having been frequented by Shakespeare about the year 1595 and 1596," in which the possible genealogy of this pipe is given.

To avoid many troubles
That others endure."

Three Compasses were a frequent sign with the French, German, and Dutch printers of the sixteenth century. The Three Compasses, Grosvenor Row, Pimlico, a well-known starting point for the Pimlico omnibuses, was formerly called the GOAT AND COMPASSES, for which Mr P. Cunningham suggests the following origin :—

"At Cologne, in the church of S. Maria di Capitolio, is a flat stone on the floor, professing to be the 'Grabstein der Bruder und Schwester eines Ehrbaren Wein und Fass Ampts, Anno 1693.' That is, as I suppose, a vault belonging to the Wine Cooper's Company. The arms exhibit a shield with a pair of compasses, an axe, and a dray or truck, with goats for supporters. In a country like England, dealing so much at one time in Rhenish wine, a more likely origin for such a sign could hardly be imagined."

Others have considered the sign a corruption of a puritanical phrase, "God encompasseth us." But why may not the Goat have been the original sign, to which mine host added his masonic emblem of the compasses, a practice yet of frequent occurrence.

The GLOBE AND COMPASSES seems to have originated in the Joiners' arms, which are a chevron between two pairs of compasses and a globe. It occurs, amongst other instances, as the sign of a bookseller, in the following quaint title :—

"Sin discovered to be worse than a Toad; sold by Robert Walton, at the Globe and Compasses, at the West end of Saint Paul's Church."

The THREE GOATSHEADS, a public-house on the Wandsworth Road, Lambeth, was originally the Cordwainers' (shoemakers) arms, which are azure, a chevron or, between three goats' heads, erased argent. Gradually the heraldic attributes have fallen away, and the goats' heads now alone remain. As there were rarely names under the London signs, the public unacquainted with heraldry gave a vernacular to the objects represented. Thus the THREE LEOPARDS' HEADS is given on a token as the name of a house in Bishopsgate; yet the token represents a chevron between three leopards' heads, the arms of the Weavers' Company. The sign of the Leopard's Head was anciently called the Lubbar's Head. Thus in the second part of Henry IV., ii. 1, the hostess says that Falstaff "is indited to dinner at the Lubbar's Head in Lumbert Street, to Master Smooth's the silkman." "Libbard," vulgo "lubbar," was good old English for "leopard."

The GREEN MAN AND STILL is a common sign. There is one in White Cross Street, representing a forester drinking what is there called "drops of life" out of a glass barrel. This is a liberty taken with the Distillers' arms, which are a fess wavy in chief, the sun in splendour, in base a still; supporters two Indians, with bows and arrows. These Indians were transformed by the painters into wild men or green men, and the green men into foresters; and then it was said that the sign originated from the partiality of foresters for the produce of the still. The "drops of life," of course, are a translation of aqua vitæ.

The THREE TUNS were derived from the Vintners, or the Brewers' arms. On the 9th of May 1667, the Three Tuns in Seething Lane was the scene of a frightful tragedy:—

"In our street," says Pepys, "at the Three Tuns Tavern, I find a great hubbub; and what was it but two brothers had fallen out, and one killed the other. And who should they be but the two Fieldings. One whereof, Bazill, was page to my Lady Sandwich, and he hath killed the other, himself being very drunk, and so is sent to Newgate."*

There seems to have been a kind of fatality attached to this sign, for the London Gazette for September 15-18, 1679, relates a murder committed at the Three Tuns, in Chandos Street, and in this same house, Sally Pridden, alias Sally Salisbury, in a fit of jealousy stabbed the Honourable John Finch in 1723. Sally was one of the handsomest "social evils" of that day, and had been nicknamed Salisbury, on account of her likeness to the countess of that name. For her attempt on the life of Finch she was committed to Newgate, where she died the year after, "leaving behind her the character of the most notorious woman that ever infested the hundreds of old Drury."† Her portrait has been painted by Sir Godfrey Kneller.

Sometimes the sign of the ONE TUN may also be seen. It occurs in the following newspaper item:—

"Last Thursday four highwaymen drinking at the One Tun Tavern near Hungerford Market in the Strand, and falling out about dividing their booty, the Drawer overheard them, sent for a constable, and secured them, and next day they were committed to Newgate."—Weekly Journal, December 6, 1718.

That these fellows meant mischief is evident from a subsequent

* Pepys here makes a mistake, for he tells us afterwards, July 4, when he went to the Session House to hear the trial, that Basil was the murdered man.

† Cnuilfield's Memoirs of Remarkable Persons. A curious epitaph upon her occurs in the Weekly Oracle, February 1, 1735; unfortunately it is too highly spiced to be introduced here.

article. They had a complete arsenal about them, viz., two blunderbusses, one loaded with fifteen balls, the other with seven, and five pistols loaded with powder and shot.

The GOLDEN CUP, from the form in which it was generally represented, seems to have been derived from the Goldsmiths' arms, which are quarterly azure, two leopards' heads or, (whence the mint mark,) and two golden cups covered between two buckles or. It was a sign much fancied by booksellers, as : Abel Jeff's in the Old Bailey, 1564 ; Edward Alde, Without Cripplegate, from 1587 until 1600 ; and John Bartlet the Elder, in St Paul's Churchyard ; whilst the THREE CUPS was a famous carriers' inn in Aldersgate in the seventeenth century.

The RAM AND TEAZEL, Queenshead Street, Islington, is a part of the Clothworkers' arms, which are sable, a chevron ermine between two habicks in chief arg., and a teasel in base or. The crest is a ram statant or on a mount vert.

The HAMMER AND CROWN appears from a trades token to have been the sign of a shop in Gutter Lane, in the seventeenth century. It was a charge from the Blacksmiths' arms : sable, a chevron between three hammers crowned or. The LION IN THE WOOD was a tavern of some note a hundred years ago in Salisbury Court, Fleet Street. It seems originally to have been the Woodmongers' arms, whose crest is a lion issuing from a wood. At the present day it is the sign of a public-house in the same locality, namely, in Wilderness Lane, Dorset Street, Fleet Street.

To these Corporation arms we may add two belonging to companies. During the South Sea mania the SOUTH SEA ARMS was a favourite sign ; in 1718, the very year that Queen Anne had established the company and granted them arms, they appeared as the sign of a tavern near Austin Friars : they are a curious heraldic compound. "Azure, a globe representing the Straights of Magellan and Cape Horn, all proper. On a canton the arms of the United Kingdoms of Great Britain, and in sinister chief two herrings salterwise arg., crowned or."

The SOL'S ARMS, Sol's Row, Hampstead Road, immortalised by Dickens in "Bleak House," derives its name from the Sol's Society, who were a kind of freemasons. They used to hold their meetings at the Queen of Bohemia's Head, Drury Lane, but on the pulling down of that house the society was dissolved.

CHAPTER IV.

SIGNS OF ANIMALS AND MONSTERS.

It is in many cases impossible to draw a line of demarcation between signs borrowed from the animal kingdom and those taken from heraldry: we cannot now determine, for instance, whether by the White Horse is meant simply an equus caballus, or the White Horse of the Saxons, and that of the House of Hanover; nor, whether the White Greyhound represented originally the supporter of the arms of Henry VII., or simply the greyhound that courses "poor puss" on our meadows in the hunting-season. For this reason this chapter has been placed as a sequel to the heraldic signs.

As a rule, fantastically coloured animals are unquestionably of heraldic origin: their number is limited to the Lion, the Boar, the Hart, the Dog, the Cat, the Bear, and in a few instances the Bull; all other animals were generally represented in what was meant for their natural colours. The heraldic lions have already been treated of in the last chapter; but sometimes we meet with the lion as a fera naturæ, recognisable by such names as the BROWN LION, the YELLOW LION, or simply the Lion. There is a public-house in Philadelphia with the sign of the Lion, having underneath the following lines:

"The lion roars, but do not fear, Cakes and beer sold here."

Which inscription is certainly as unnecessary as that over the nonformidable-looking lions under the celebrated fountain in the Spanish Alhambra, "O thou who beholdest these lions crouching, fear not, life is wanting to enable them to exhibit their fury."

Lions occur in numerous combinations with other animals and objects, which in many cases seem simply the union of two signs, as the LION AND DOLPHIN, Market Place, Leicester; the LION AND TUN, at Congleton: the LION AND SWAN in the same locality may owe its joint title to the name of the street in which the public-house is situated, viz., Swanbank. The combination of the LION AND PHEASANT, Wylecop, Shrewsbury, seems rather mysterious, unless the Pheasant has been substituted for the Cock, just as in the THREE PHEASANTS AND SCEPTRE, they were substituted for the THREE PIGEONS AND SCEPTRE. As for the

When Anson was in general disfavour about the Minorca affair, the following biting reply to this inscription went the round of the newspapers :—

" The Traveller's reply to the Centurion's Lion.

" O King of Beasts, what pity 'twas to sever
A pair whose Union had been just for ever !
So diff'rently advanced ! 'twas surely wrong,
When you 'd been fellow-travellers so long.
Had you continued with him, had he born
To see the English Lion dragg'd and torn ?
Brittannia made at every vein to bleed,
A ravenous Crew of worthless Men to feed ?
No ; Anson once had sought the Land's Relief ;
Now — Ease and Dignity have banish'd Grief.
Go, rouse him then, to save a sinking nation,
Or call him up, the partner of your station.
We often see two Monsters for a sign,
Inviting to good Brandy, Ale, or Wine."

The TIGER is of rare occurrence on signboards ; there is a GOLDEN TIGER in Pilgrim Street, Newcastle, and a bird-fancier on Tower Dock, not far from the then famous menagerie which attracted crowds to the Tower, chose the LEOPARD AND TIGER for his sign. In 1665 there was a LEOPARD Tavern in Chancery Lane ; the same animal is still occasionally seen on public-house signs. Generally speaking, the carnivorous animals are not great favourites, and those named above are almost the only examples that occur. As for the popularity of the BEAR, it is entirely to be attributed to the old vulgar pleasure of seeing him ill-treated, a relic of the once common amusements of bear-baiting and whipping. The colours in which he is represented are the BLACK BEAR, the BROWN BEAR, the WHITE BEAR, and in a very few instances (as at Leeds) the RED BEAR.

Besides bear-whipping and bear-baiting, another barbarous fancy led sometimes to the choice of this animal for a sign,—viz., the lamentable pun which the publican made upon the article he sold, and the name of the animal. Will. Rose of Coleraine, in Ireland, for instance, issued trades tokens with a bear passant, on the reverse EXCHANGE.FOR.A.CAN (i.e., of Bear!), and as if the pun was not ridiculous enough, there was a rose as a rebus for his name. Thomas Dawson of Leeds perpetrated a similar pun on his token, dated 1670 ; it says,—BEWARE.OF.Y^E.BEARE, evidently alluding to the strength of his beer.*

* "Boyne's and Akerman's Trades Tokens of the 17th Century," in England, Ireland, and Wales.

Bears used often to be represented with chains round their neck, (as on the stone sign in Addle Street, with the date 1610.) This led to the following amusing rejoinder :—It happened that a pedestrian artist had run up a bill at a road-side inn which he was unable to pay, whereupon the landlord, in order to settle the account, commissioned him to paint a bear for his sign. The painter, wanting to make a little besides, suggested that, if the bear was painted with a chain round his neck, which he strongly advised him to have, it would cost him half-a-guinea more, on account of the gold, &c. But the host was not agreeable to this extra expense ; accordingly, the sign was painted, (but in distemper,) and the painter went his way. Not many days after it began to rain, and the bear was completely washed from the board. The first time the landlord met the painter, he accused him in great dudgeon of having imposed upon him, for that, in less than a month, the bear had gone from his signboard. "Now, look here," replied the painter ; "did not I advise you to have a chain put about the bear's neck ? but you would not hear of it ; had that been done he could not have run away, and would still be at your door."

Among the most famous Bear inns and taverns were,—the Bear "at Bridgefoot," i.e., at the foot of London Bridge, on the Southwark side, for many centuries one of the most popular London taverns ; as early as the reign of Richard III. we find it the resort of the aristocratic pleasure-seeker. Thus, in March 1463, it was repeatedly visited by Jocky of Norfolk, the then Sir John Howard, who went there to drink wine and shoot at the target, at which he lost 20 pence.* It is also frequently named by the writers of the seventeenth century.† Pepys mentions it April 3, 1667. "I hear how the king is not so well pleased of this marriage between the Duke of Richmond and Mrs Stuart, as is talked ; and that he by a wile did fetch her to the Bear at the Bridgefoot, where a coach was ready, and they are stole away into Kent without the king's leave." The wine of this establishment did not meet with the approbation of the fastidious searchers after claret in 1691.

"Through stinks of all sorts, both the simple and compound,
Which through narrow alleys, our senses do confound,
We came to the Bear, which we now understood
Was the first house in Southwark built after the flood ;

* Steward's Accounts of Sir John Howard.

† See Cunningham's London Past and Present, p. 41.

And has such a succession of vintners known,
 Not more names were e'er in Welsh pedigrees shown;
 But claret with them was so much out of fashion,
 That it has not been known there a whole generation."

Last Search after Claret in Southwark, 1691.

This old tavern was pulled down in 1761, at the removal of the houses from London Bridge. "Thursday last the workmen employed in pulling down the Bear Tavern, at the foot of London Bridge, found several pieces of gold and silver coin of Queen Elizabeth, and other money, to a considerable value."—Public Advertiser, Dec. 26, 1761. Coins, no doubt, dropped between the boards by the revellers of bygone generations.

There was another famous Bear Tavern at the foot of Strand-bridge; the vicinity of the "Bear" and "Paris Gardens" had evidently suggested the choice of those signs. At the Bear Tavern in the Strand, the earliest meetings of the Society of Antiquaries took place, when there were as yet only three members, Mr Talman, Mr Bagford, and Mr Wanley. Their first meeting was on Friday, Nov. 5, 1707; subsequently they met at the Young Devil Tavern in Fleet Street, and then at the Fountain, opposite Chancery Lane. Mr Talman was the first president; Mr Wanley was a savant of considerable acquirements. It was he who purchased Bagford's MS. collection for the Harleian Library.

The WHITE BEAR at Soper's Lane End, (now Queen Street,) Cheapside, was the shop in which Baptist Hicks, as a silk mercer, by selling silks, velvets, lace, and plumes to the courtiers of James I., amassed that fortune which led to the Peerage, and the title of Viscount Campden. There was another White Bear Tavern in Thames Street, of which the sign is still extant, a stone bas-relief with the date 1670, and the initials M. E. In 1252, Henry III. received a white bear as a present from the king of Norway; and in King Edward VI.'s time, May 29, 1549, the French ambassadors, after they had supped with the Duke of Somerset, went to the Thames and saw the bear hunted in the river.* Such an occurrence might easily lead to the adoption of this animal as a sign in that locality. The following little fact connected with another White Bear Inn forcibly calls up the dark ages before gas was invented. In 1656, John Wardall gave by will to the Grocers' Company a tenement called "The White Bear in Wal-

* Burnet's History of the Reformation, Lib. II., vol. II., p. 14. It is possible also that the White Bear was set up in compliment to Anne, daughter of the Earl of Warwick, queen to Richard III., who, as a difference from her father's bear and ragged staff, had adopted the White Bear as a badge.

brook," upon condition that they should yearly pay to the churchwardens of St Botolph's, Billingsgate, £4 to provide a lanthorn with a candle, so that passengers might go with more security to and from the waterside during the night. This lamp was to be fixed at the north-east corner of the parish church of St Botolph, from St Bartholomew's-day to Lady-day; out of this sum £1 was to be paid to the sexton for taking care of the lanthorn. The annuity is now applied to a lamp lighted with gas in the place prescribed by the will.*

The White Bear Inn, at the east end of Piccadilly, was for more than a century one of the busiest coaching houses. In this house died Luke Sullivan, engraver of some of Hogarth's works; also Chatelain, another engraver, the last in such penurious circumstances, that he was buried at the expense of some friends in the poor ground of St James's workhouse. It was in this inn that West passed the first night in London on his arrival from America. The sign of the White Bear is still common; at Springbank, Hull, there is one called, with zoological precision, the POLAR BEAR. This may, however, refer to the constellation.

The BEAR'S HEAD occurs in Congleton, Cheshire; probably it is a family crest, the same as the BEAR'S PAW,—both of which, it is believed, occur only in that county and in Lancashire. The Bear is also met in frequent combinations; one of the most common is the BEAR AND BACCHUS, which looks like a hieroglyphic rendering of the words Beer and Wine, having the additional attraction of alliteration. Since mythology does not mention a Beer-God, the animal was probably chosen as a rebus for the drink. In the BEAR AND RUMMER, Mortimer Street, the rummer implies the sale of liquors, in the same manner as the Punchbowl is often used. The BEAR AND HARROW seems to be a union of two signs. In the seventeenth century it formed the house-decoration of an ordinary at the entrance of Butcher Row, (now Picket Street, Strand.) One night in 1692, Nat Lee, the mad poet, in going home drunk from this house, fell down in the snow and was stifled.

The Elephant, in the middle ages, was nearly always represented with the castle on his back. For instance, in the Latin MS., Bestiarium Harl., 4751, a tower is strapped to him, in which are seen five knights in chain-armour, with swords, battle-axes, and cross-bows, their emblazoned shields hanging round the battlements; and, in the description of the animal, it is said, "In eorum dorsis, P[er] si et Indi ligneis turribus collocati tamquam de muro jaculis dimicant." The rook, in Chinese chessboards, still represents an elephant thus armed.

* Timbs's Flycaves.

Cutlers in the last century frequently used the ELEPHANT AND CASTLE as their sign, on account of it being the crest of the Cutlers' Company, who had adopted it in reference to the ivory used in the trade. Hence the stone bas-relief in Belle Sauvage Yard, which was the sign of some now forgotten shopkeeper, who had chosen it out of regard to his landlords. The houses in the yard are the property of the Cutlers' Company. The ELEPHANT AND CASTLE public-house, Newington Butts, was formerly a famous coaching inn, but, by the introduction of railways, it has dwindled down to a starting-point for omnibuses. The occasion of this sign being put up was the following:—Some time about 1714, a Mr Conyers, an apothecary in Fleet Street, and a great collector of antiquities, was digging in a gravel-pit in a field near the Fleet, not far from Battle Bridge, when he discovered the skeleton of an elephant. A spear with a flint head, fixed to a shaft of goodly length, was found near it, whence it was conjectured to have been killed by the British in a fight with the Romans,* though now, since the late discoveries concerning the flint implements, very different conclusions would be drawn from this fact. But be this as it may, that elephant, whether post-tertiary or Roman, gave its name to the public-house soon after erected in that locality; and, regardless of the venerable antiquity of this origin, it is often now-a-days jocularly degraded into the PIG AND TINDER-BOX.

What is meant by the whimsical combination of the ELEPHANT AND FISH, at Sandhill, Newcastle, is hard to say, unless we assume the fish originally to have been a dragon. Between elephants and dragons there was supposed to be a deadly strife, and their battles are recorded by Strabo, Pliny, Ælianus, and their mediæval followers. The fight always ended in the death of both, the dragon strangling the elephant in the windings of his tail, when the elephant, falling down dead, crushed the dragon by his weight.

The ELEPHANT AND FRIAR, in Bristol, may possibly have originated from the representation of an elephant accompanied by a

* Bagford, who was present at the excavations, relates this story in a letter prefixed to Leland's Collectanea, p. lxiii., 1770. See also Sir John Oldcastle.

an old German work on Alchemy,* one of the plates represents a dragon eating his own tail; underneath are the words,— “Das ist gros Wunder und seltsam List, Die höchst Artzney im Drachen ist.” †

In mediæval alchemy, the dragon seems to have been the emblem of Mercury, which appears from these words on the same print: “Mercurius recte et chymice præcipitatus vel sublimatus in sua propria aqua resolutus et rursum coagulatus.” ‡ To which are added the following rhymes:—

“Ein Drach im Walde wohnend ist,
An Gift demselben nichts gebrist;
Wenn er die Sonne sieht und das Fewr
So speusst er Gift fleugt ungehewr,
Kein Lebend Thier für ihm mag gnesn
Der Basilisc mag ihm nit gleich wesen.
Wer diesen Wurmb wol weiss zu tödtn
Der kömpt auss allen seinen Nöthen.
Sein Farber in seinem Todt sich vermehren;
Auss seiner Gift Artzney thut werden.
Sein Gift verzehrt er gar und ganz
Und frisst sein eign vergiften Schwantz.
Da mus er in sich selbst volbringen
Der edelst Balsam auss ihm thut tringen,
Solch grosse Tugend wird man schawen
Welches alle Weyan sich hoch erfrawen.” §

Hence the dragon became one of the “properties” of the chemist and apothecary, was painted on his drug-pots, hung up as his sign, and some dusty, stuffed crocodile hanging from the ceiling in the laboratory had to do service for the monster, and inspire the vulgar with a profound awe for the mighty man who had conquered the vicious reptile.

The SALAMANDER was another animal of the same class, and also represented certain chemical actions, owing to its fabled powers of resisting the fire. The notions of early naturalists concerning this creature were very extraordinary. A Bestiarium

* “Lamspring, das ist ein herzlischen Teutscher Tractat von Philosophischen Steine, welchen für Jahren ein adelicher Teutscher Philosophus, Lampert Spring geheissen mit schöne Figuren beschrieben hat. Frankfort am Main, 1625.”

† “This is a great wonder, and very strange: the dragon contains the greatest medicament.”

‡ “Mercury rightly precipitated or sublimated in its own water dissolved and again coagulated.”

§ “There is a dragon lives in the forest who has no want of poison: when he sees the sun or fire he spits venom, which flies about fearfully. No living animal can be cured of it; even the basilisk does not equal him. He who can properly kill this serpent has overcome all his danger. His colours increase in death; physis is produced from his poison, which he entirely consumes, and eats his own venomous tail. This must be accomplished by him in order to produce the noblest balm. Such great virtue as will point out herein that all the learned shall rejoice.”

presens venenum. Sed hoc non satis probatum est."* Whatever it was that passed for unicorn's horn, (probably the horn of the narwal,) it was sold at an immense price. "The unicorn whose horn is worth a city," says Decker in his Gull's Hornbook; and Andrea Racci, a Florentine physician, relates that it had been sold by the apothecaries at £24 per ounce, when the current value of the same quantity of gold was only £2, 3s. 6d. In a MS. table of customs entitled, "The Book of Rates in y^e first yeare of Queen Mary 1531,"† we find the duty paid upon "cornu unicorni y^e ounce 20s." An Italian author who visited England in the reign of Henry VII.,‡ speaking of the immense wealth of the religious houses in this country says:—"And I have been informed that, amongst other things, many of these monasteries possess unicorns' horns of an extraordinary size." Hence such a horn was fit to be placed among the royal jewels, and there it appears at the head of an inventory taken in the first year of Queen Elizabeth, and preserved in Pepys's library.§ "Imprimis, a piece of unicorn's horn," which, as the most valuable object, is named first.

This was no doubt the piece seen by the German traveller Hentzner, at Windsor: "We were shown here, among other things, the horn of a unicorn of above eight spans and a half in length, valued at above £10,000."|| Peacham places "that horne of Windsor (of an unicorne very likely)"¶ amongst the sights worth seeing. Fuller also speaks of a unicorn's horn—"in my memory shewn to people in the Tower"—— and enters on a long dissertation about its virtues; but it seems to have been lost, or at least, no longer exhibited in his time.

The belief in the efficacy and value of this horn continued to the close of the seventeenth century; for the Rev. John Ward in his diary, p. 172, says:—

"Mr Hartman had a piece of unicorn's horn, which one Mr Godeski gave him; hee had itt att some foraine prince's court. I had the piece in my hand. Hee desired Dr Willis to make use of itt in curing his ague; but the Dr refusd because hee had never seen itt used. Mr Hartman told me the forementioned gentleman has as much of itt as would make a cup, and

* "It is reported that the unicorn's horn sweats when it comes in the presence of poison, and that for this reason it is laid on the tables of the great, and made into knife-handles, which, when placed on the tables, show the presence of poison. But this is not sufficiently proved."—Albertus Magnus, De Animalibus, lib. xxv.

† Bib. Harl. 5953, vol. i., p. 403.

‡ Relation of the Island of England, published by the Camden Society.

§ See Bib. Harl. 5953, vol. i., p. 407.

|| Hentzner's Travels, p. 64.

¶ Henry Peacham's Complient Gentleman.

 Fuller's Worthies, voce Middlesex.

PLATE VIII.

TWO SPIES,
(Banke's Collection, 1726.)

THREE NEATS' TONGUES
(Harleian Collection, 1706.)

MAN IN THE MOON,
(Banke's Collection, 1700.)

BULL AND MOUTH.
(St Martin's-le-Grand, 1833.)

BULL AND MOUTH.
(August St., St Martin's-le-Grand, circa 1800.)

1. The first part of the document is a list of names and addresses of the members of the committee.

2. The second part of the document is a list of names and addresses of the members of the committee.

courtyard, where the lumbering coaches used to arrive and depart, is now an open space, round which houses are built. The RACCOON is a painted sign at Dalston, but a hyæna seems to have sat for the portrait; the HIPPOPOTAMUS occurs in New-England Street, Brighton; the IBEX at Chadelworth, Wantage; the CROCODILE in Higham Street, Norwich; the CAMEL may be met with in a few instances, and at Weston Peverell, Plymouth, there is the sign of the CAMEL'S HEAD. Finally, there is the KANGAROO, of which, occasionally, an example may be seen, set up probably by some landlord who had tried his luck in Australia. The CIVET is common all over Europe as a perfumer's sign, as it was said to produce musk. A Dutch perfumer in the seventeenth century wrote under his sign:—

"Dit's in de Civet kat, gelyk gy kunt aanschouwen, Maar komt hier binnen, hier zyn parfuimen voor mannen en vrouwen." *

The HEDGEHOG was never very common. In the reign of Queen Elizabeth it was the sign of William Seeres, bookseller, in St Paul's Churchyard, who put it up, according to Bagford, on account of its being the badge of his former master Sir Henry Sydney.† Apparently this same house was concerned in the following strange affair:—

"By a lettere dated London, 11 May 1555, it appears that in Powles Churchyearde at the sign of the Hedgehog, the goodwife of the house was brought to bed of a manchild, being of the age of 6 dayes and dienge the 7th daye followinge; and half an hour before it departed spake these words followinge: (rise and pray) and so continued half an houre in thes words and then cryinge departed the worlde. Hereupon the Bishope of London examined the Goodman of the house and other credible persones who affirmed it to be true and will dye uppon the same." ‡

The Hedgehog is now very scarce on signboards; at Dadlington, near Market Bosworth, there is a DOG AND HEDGEHOG, doubtless borrowed from the well-known engraving of "A Rough Customer."

Signs relating to sport or the chase are comparatively common; thus we have the RAT AND FERRET at Wilson, near Ashby de la Zouch; the THREE CONIES, or rabbits, figure on an old trades

* "This is the Civet, as you may see; but enter. Perfumes sold here for men and women."

† The reason why the hedgehog was generally represented with apples stuck on his quills, appears from the following words in Bossewell, (p. 61.)—"He clymeth upon a vine or an apple-tree and biteth off their braunches and twigges, and when they [the apples] be fallen downe, he waloweth on them, and so they sticke on his prickles, and he beareth them unto a hollow tree or some other hole." The early naturalists also said that if, when he was so loaded, one of the apples happened to drop off, he would throw all the others down in anger and return to the tree for a new load.

‡ Harl. MSS. 333, fol. 145.

token of Blackman Street; the HARE, on the token of John Perris in the Strand, 1666; and Nicholas Warren, in Aldersgate.* Warren evidently made a cockney mistake, thinking that hares, instead of rabbits, lived in warrens. Another Hare was the sign of Philip House in Walbrook in 1682.† The HARE AND SQUIRREL occur together on a sign at Nuneaton; what the combination means it is difficult to surmise.

"Cages with climbing SQUIRRELS and bells to them were formerly the indispensable appendages of the outside of a Tinman's shop, and were, in fact, the only live sign. One, we believe, still (1826) hangs out on Holborn; but they are fast vanishing with the good old modes of our ancestors."‡

The THREE SQUIRRELS was the sign of an inn at Lambeth, mentioned by Taylor the Water poet in 1636; and from a trades token it appears that in the seventeenth century there was a similar sign in Fleet Street. Probably it was the same house which, in 1673, was occupied by Gosling the banker, "over against St Dunstan's Church," where the triad of squirrels may still be seen in the iron-work of the windows. Gosling's was one of the leading banking establishments in the reign of Charles II. Among the curiosities of this old firm is a bill for £640, 8s., paid out of the secret service money for gold lace and silver lace, bought by the Duchess of Cleveland for the wedding clothes of the Lady Sussex and Litchfield.

The HARE AND HOUNDS are very common; some fifty years ago it was the sign of a notorious establishment in St Giles's, one of those places associated with "the good old customs of our ancestors." As the few houses of this character that remain are difficult of access, a description of this place may not be uninteresting.

"The Hare and Hounds was to be reached by those going from the west end towards the city, by going up a turning on the left hand, nearly opposite St Giles's churchyard. The entrance to this turning or lane was obstructed or defended by posts with cross bars, which being passed, the lane itself was entered. It extended some twenty or thirty yards towards the north, through two rows of the most filthy, dilapidated, and execrable buildings that could be imagined; and at the top or end of it stood the citadel, of which 'Stunning Joe' was the corpulent castellan;—I need not say that it required some determination and some address to gain this strange place of rendezvous. Those who had the honour of an introduction to the great man were considered safe, wherever his authority extended, and in

* London Gazette, No. 368.

† London Gazette, Sept. 18–21, 1682. I am confident the newspapers made a misprint, and that the man's name was Haase, Dutch or German, for the Hare he represented on his sign.

‡ Hone's Every-Day Book, Oct. 17, fol. 1.

this locality it was certainly very extensive. He occasionally condescended to act as a pilot through the navigation of the alley to persons of aristocratic or wealthy pretensions, whom curiosity, or some other motive best known to themselves, led to his abode. Those who were not under his safe conduct frequently found it very unsafe to wander in the intricacies of this region. In the salon of this temple of low debauchery were assembled groups of all 'unutterable things,' all that class distinguished in those days, and, I believe, in these, by the generic term 'cadgers.'

Hail cadgers, who in rags array'd,
Disport and play fantastic pranks;
Each Wednesday night in full parade,
Within the domicile of Bank's.

A 'lady' presided over the revels, collected largess in a platter, and, at intervals, amused the company with specimens of her vocal talent. Dancing was 'kept up till a late hour,' with more vigour than elegance, and many terpsichorean passages, which partook rather of the animation of the 'Nautch' than the dignity of the minuet, increased the interest of the performance. It may be supposed that those who assembled were not the sort of people who would have patronised Father Matthew had he visited St Giles's in those times. There was indeed an almost incessant complaint of drought, which seemed to be increased by the very remedies applied for its cure; and had it not been for the despotic authority with which the dispenser of the good things of the establishment exercised his rule, his liberality in the dispensation would certainly have led to very vigorous developments of the reprobation of man and of woman also. In the lower tier, or cellars, or crypt of the edifice, beds or berths were provided for the company, who, packed in bins after the 'fitful fever' of the evening, slept well."*

In 1750 there was a sign of the HARE AND CATS at Norwich,† which was clearly a travesty of the Hare and Hounds.

The STAG may in early times have been put up as a religious type. As such it is of constant occurrence in the catacombs and in early Christian sculptures, in allusion to Psalm xlii., "Like as the hart desireth the water brook, so longeth my soul after thee, O God!"‡ The Stag is still a very common sign. A publican on the Fulham Road has put up the sign of the Stag, and added to this on the tympanum: "Rex in regno suo non habet parem," the application of which is best known to mine host himself.

The BALDFACED STAG is seen in many places: baldfaced is a term applied to horses who have a white strip down the forehead to the nose. At Chigwell in Essex there is a BALD HIND, and

* Rev. J. Richardson, LL.B., Recollections of the Last Half Century. See also under STUNNING JOE BANKS in the Slang Dictionary, recently issued by the publisher of this work.

† Gentleman's Magazine, March 1842.

‡ See under RELIGIOUS SIGNS.

SWANS AND PEAL at Walsall; the NELSON AND PEAL, and many others.

Among the taverns with the sign of the ROEBUCK that have become famous, the house in Cheapside may be mentioned as a notorious place during the Whig riots in 1715.

Not only the Deer tribe themselves, but their HORNS also make a considerable figure on the signboard. It is probably to the sign of the Horns that allusion is made in the roll of the Pardoner, "Cocke Lorell's Bote :"—

"Here is Maryone Marchauntes at Allgate
Her Husbode dwells at ye siggne of ye Cokeldes Pate."

The HORNS was a tavern of note in Fleet Street in the reign of Queen Elizabeth :

"The xvj day of September (1557), cam owt of Spayn to the Quens Cowrt in post Monser Regamus, gorgyal appparelled, with divers Spaneardes, and with grett cheynes, and their hats sett with stones and perilles, and sopyd [supped], and by vij of the cloke were again on horsbake, and so thrugh Flet Strett, and at the HORNES they dronke, and at the GRAYHONDE, and so thrugh Chepesyde, and so over the bryge, and so rod all nyght toward Dover."—Machyn's Diary.

Sometimes the Horns are specified as the HART'S HORNS Inn, Smithfield, near Pie Corner, one of the houses in the yard of which Joe Miller used to play during Bartholomew Fair time, when he was associated with Pinkethman at the head of a troop of actors. The London Daily Post for August 24, &c., 1721, contains several advertisements of his troop, and the parts played by himself.

What most contributed to the popularity of this sign in the environs of London was the custom alluded to by Byron :

"And many to the steep of Highgate hie,
Ask ye, Boeotian shades! the reason why,
'Tis to the worship of the solemn horn,
Grasp'd in the holy hand of mystery,
In whose dread name both men and maids are sworn,
And consecrate the oath with draught and dance till morn."*

Highgate was the headquarters for this swearing on the horn. Hone gives the oath in the following form :—

"An old and respectable inhabitant of the village says, that 60 years ago, upwards of 80 stages stopped every day at the Red Lion, and that out of every 5 passengers 3 were sworn. The oath was delivered standing, and ran thus: 'Take notice what I now say unto you, for that is the first word of your oath—mind that! You must acknowledge me to be your adopted father, I must acknowledge you to be my adopted son (or daughter). If you do not call me father, you forfeit a bottle of wine. If I do not call cattle rested on their way from the north, certain graziers were accustomed to put up at the Gatehouse for the night. But as they could not wholly exclude strangers who, like themselves, were travelling on business, they brought an ox to the door, and those who did not choose to kiss its horns, after going through the ceremony described, were not deemed fit members of their society. Similar customs prevailed in other places, as at Waro, at the Griffin in Hoddesdon, &c.

* Ohilde Harold, canto I. lxx.

On the Continent the sign of the Horns was formerly equally common, often accompanied with some sly allusion to what Othello calls "the forked plague." Thus in the Rue Bourg Chavin, in Lyons, there is now a pair of horns with the inscription "SUNT SIMILIA TUIS;" and a Dutch shopkeeper of the seventeenth century wrote under his sign of the Horns—

"Ik draag Hoornen dat ider ziet, Maar menig draagt Hoornen en weet het niet." *

The Fox, as might be expected, is to be seen in a great many places; there is one at Frandley, Cheshire, with the following rhymes:—

"Behold the Fox, near Frandley stocks,
Pray catch him when you can,
For they sell here, good ale and beer,
To any honest man."

A still more absurd inscription accompanies the sign of the Fox at Folkesworth, near Stilton, Hunts:—

"I . HAM . A . CUNEN . FOX
YOU . SEE . THER . HIS .
NO . HARM . ATCHED .
TO . ME . IT . IS . MY . MRS
WISH . TO . PLACE . ME
HERE . TO . LET . YOU . NO .
HE . SELLS . GOOD . BEERE ."

Formerly there used to be a sign of the THREE FOXES in Clement's Lane, Lombard Street, carved in stone, representing three foxes sitting in a row. But a few years ago the house came into the possession of a legal firm, who, no doubt afraid of the jokes to which the sign might lead, thought it advisable to do away with the carving by covering it over with plaster.

One of the most favourite combinations is the Fox AND Goose, represented by a fox currant, with the neck of the goose in his mouth and the body cast over his back. It seems sug

* "I wear horns, which everybody sees,
But many a one wears horns and does not know it."

ancient inn remained much in its Elizabethan condition till the year 1799, when certain alterations cleared away the old-fashioned fire-places, chimney-pieces, and dog-irons, by which had sat the weather-beaten soldiers of Cromwell, the highwaymen lying in ambush for the mail coaches, and the fair London ladies out on a sly trip.

Some other combinations are not so easily explained, such as the FOX AND CAP, Long Lane, Smithfield: but when we see the bill of this shop* the mystery is explained; it was the sign of Tho. Tronsdale, a capmaker, and represented a fox running, with a cap painted above him, to intimate the man's business. The FOX AND CROWN, Nottingham and Newark, is evidently a combination of two signs. The FOX AND KNOT, Snow Hill, seems to be of old standing, as it has given its name to a court close by. Its origin, doubtless, is exactly similar to that of the Fox and Cap; the knot or top-knot being a head-dress worn by ladies in the last century. The FLYING FOX at Colchester, may either allude to some kind of bat or flying squirrel (?) thus denominated, or is a landlord's caprice.

It is certainly somewhat strange that in this sporting country the sign of the Brush or the Fox's Tail should be so rare; in fact, no instance of its use is now to be found, although, beside the interest attached to it in the hunting field, it had the honour of being one of the badges of the Lancaster family. What is still more surprising is, that the Fox's TAIL should have been the sign of a Parisian bookseller, Jean Ruelle, in 1540; but what prompted him to choose this sign is now rather difficult to guess.

DOMESTIC ANIMALS.

Notwithstanding the ballad of the "Vicar and Moses," which says,

*"At the sign of the Horse old Spintext of course
Each night took his pipe and his pot,"*

the horse rarely or never occurs without a distinctive adjective to determine its colour, action, or other attribute. All natural colours of the horse, and some others, are found on the signboard—black, white, bay, sorrel, (rare,) pied, spotted, red, sometimes golden, and in one instance, at Grantham, a BLUE Horse is met

* Bagford Bills. Bib. Harl. 5962.

Duke to be a dissenter, and thinking he must be a Catholic, offered to send for a Catholic priest, to which the Duke answered, 'No,' said he, 'those rascals eat God; but if you know of any set of fellows that eat the devil, I should be obliged to you if you would send for one of them!'

All of a piece! So ended

"That life of pleasure, and that soul of whim."*

At the White Horse in Kensington, Addison wrote several of his Spectators. His favourite dinner, when he stayed at this house, was fillet of veal and a bottle of claret. The old inn remained in its original state till about forty years ago, when it was pulled down, and the name changed to the HOLLAND ARMS; but the sign is still preserved in the parlour of the new establishment.

Edinburgh also has its famous White Horse; in a close in the Canongate, an inn dating from the time of Queen Mary Stuart, and which Scott has introduced in one of his novels, may still be seen. It was well-known to runaway couples, and hundreds have been made happy or unhappy for life "at a moment's notice," in its large room, in which, as well as in the White Hart in the Grassmarket, these impromptu marriages were as regularly performed as at Gretna Green. The WHITE HORSE CELLAR, Piccadilly, now a tame omnibus office, was for more than a century one of the bustling coaching inns for the West. "Some persons think the sublimest object in nature is a ship launched on the bosom of the ocean; but give me, for my private satisfaction, the mail coaches that pour down Piccadilly of an evening, tear up the pavement, and devour the way before them to the Land's-End."—Hazlitt. This place calls up pleasant fancies of travelling by the mail, through merry roads, with blooming hawthorn and chestnut trees, larks singing aloft, the village bells, and the blacksmith's hammer tinkling in the distance; but another White Horse Inn shows the dark side of the picture—the unsafety of the roads, for the White Horse, corner of Welbeck Street, Cavendish Square, was long a detached public-house, where travellers customarily stopped for refreshment, and to examine their firearms before crossing the fields to Lisson Green.† The last White Horse we shall mention was in Pope's Head Alley, the sign of John Sudbury and George Humble, the first men that opened a printshop in London, in the beginning of the seventeenth century. Peacham, in his "Compleat Gentleman," says that Goltzius' en-and betting carried to great excess. The famous George Earl of Cumberland is recorded to have wasted more money than any of his ancestors, chiefly by racing and tilting. In 1599, private matches by gentlemen who rode their own horses were of frequent occurrence. In the reign of James I. public races were celebrated at various places, under much the same regulations as now. The most celebrated were called Bellcourses. In the latter part of the reign of Charles I. there were races in Hyde Park as well as at Newmarket. Charles II. was very fond of this diversion, and appointed meetings at Datchet Mead when he resided at Windsor. Gradually, however, Newmarket became the principal place. The king, a constant attendant, established a house for his own accommodation, and entered horses in his royal name. Instead of bells, he gave a silver bowl or a cup, value 100 guineas, on which the exploit and pedigree of the winning horse were generally engraved. William III. and Queen Anne both added to the plate. George I., towards the end of his reign, discontinued the plate and gave 100 guineas instead; George II. made several racing regulations, about the age of horses, the weight of jockeys, &c. Already, in 1768, the horses had obtained great swiftness; for Misson, in his "Travels," mentions one that ran 20 miles in 55 minutes upon uneven ground, which for those times was certainly a remarkable feat.

* Richardsoniana, p. 168.

† Timbs, Curiosities of London, p. 402.

The BELL AND HORSE is an old and still frequent sign; it occurs on trades tokens; as John Harcourt at the BELL AND BLACK HORSE in Finsbury, 1668, and on various others; whilst at the present day it may be seen at many a roadside alehouse. Bells were a favourite addition to the trappings of horses in the middle ages. Chaucer's abbot is described:—

"When he rode men his bridle hear,
Gingling in a whistling wind as clere,
And eke as loud as doth a chapel bell."

In a MS. in the Cottonian Library * relating the journey of Margaret of England to Scotland, there to be married to King James, we find constant mention of these bells. The horse of Sir William Ikarguil, companion of Sir William Conyars, sheriff of Yorkshire, is described as "his Hors Harnays full of campanes [bells] of silver and gylt." Whilst the master of the horse of the Duke of Northumberland was "monted upon a gentyll horse, and cam-

* Printed in Leland's Collectanea, pp. 270, 272.

Dat men de menschen dat mee kon doen zy hoefden dan geen schoenen te dragen."*

The HORSE AND STAG, (Finningley, Nottinghamshire,) and the HORSE AND GATE, are both hunting signs; yet the last may have been suggested by the Bull and Gate. The HORSE AND TRUMPET is a very common sign, illustrating the war horse; the HORSE AND CHAISE (or shaze, as it is spelled) in the Broad Centry, (sanctuary,) Westminster, is named in an advertisement in the Postboy, Jan. 23-25, 1711; whilst the CHAISE AND PAIR is still to be seen at Northill, Colchester.

The NAG'S HEAD—which only in one instance is varied by the HORSE'S HEAD, namely, at Brampton in Cumberland—is a sign that has become famous in history; it is represented on the print of the entry of Queen Marie de' Medici on her visit to her daughter Henriette Marie, Queen of Charles I., being the sign of a notorious tavern opposite the Cheapside Cross. It is suspended from a long square beam, at the end of which a large crown of evergreens is seen. As none of the other houses are decked with greens, this apparently represents the Bush.† This tavern was the fictitious scene of the consecration of the Protestant bishops at the accession of Queen Elizabeth in 1559. It was pretended by the adversaries of the Protestant faith, that a certain number of ecclesiastics, in a hurry to take possession of the vacant sees, assembled here; where they were to undergo the ceremony from Antony Kitchen, alias Dunstane, Bishop of Llandaff, a sort of occasional Nonconformist, who had taken the oath of supremacy to Elizabeth; Bonner, Bishop of London, (then confined in the Tower,) hearing of it, sent his chaplain to Kitchen, threatening him with excommunication in case he proceeded. On this the prelate refused to perform the ceremony; whereupon, according to Catholics, Parker and the other candidates, rather than defer possession of their dioceses, determined to consecrate one another, which they did, without any sort of scruple. Scorey began with Parker, who instantly rose Archbishop of Canterbury. The refutation of this tale may be read in Strype's life of Archbishop Parker.‡

A curious anecdote is told concerning the sign of a GELDING.

* "At the White Horse, horses are shod with iron, Pity the same cannot be done to men, for then they would need no shoes."

† Crowns exactly similar to this, made of box, tinsel, and coloured paper, are yearly hung out by the fishmongers in Holland on the first arrival of the salt herring after the summer fishery.

‡ Pennant's Account of London, p. 423.

a public-house at Buglawton, near Congleton ; the MARTIN'S NEST, at Thornhill Bridge, Normanton ; the KITE'S NEST, (an unpromising name for an inn, if there be anything in a name,) at Stretton, in Herefordshire ; and finally, the BROOD HEN, or HEN AND CHICKENS, which latter is more common than any of the former. Not improbably it originated with the sign of the Pelican's Nest, to which several of the above-named nests may be referred. Under the name of the "Brood Hen," it occurs on a trades token of Battle Bridge, Southwark ; as the "Hen and Chickens," it was also known in the seventeenth century, for there are tokens of John Sell "at y^e Hen and Chickens on Hammond's Key ;" it is likewise mentioned in the following daily occurrence of the good old times :—

"Wednesday night last, Captain Lambert was stopt by three footpads near the Hen and Chickens, between Peckham and Camberwell, and robbed of a sum of money and his gold watch." *

The prevalence of this sign may be accounted for by the kindred love for the barleycorn in the human and gallinaceous tribes. It was also used as a sign by Paulus Sessius, a bookseller of Prague, in 1606, who printed some of Kepler's astronomical works ; above his colophon, representing the hen and her offspring, is the motto : "GRANA DAT A FIMO SCRUTANS," the application of which is not very obvious.

Speaking of birds' nests figuring as signs, we may mention that, at the beginning of the present century, the small shops under the tree at the corner of Milk Street, City, used to describe themselves "as under the Crow's Nest, Cheapside." An old-fashioned snuff shop, still in existence, issued its tobacco papers in this way, and the small bookshop there at present advertises itself as "under the tree," although it was only very recently that the crow ceased to visit and repair his nest here.

The THREE COLTS, in Bride Lane, 1652, is represented on a trades token by three colts running ; such a sign gave its name to a street in Limehouse. The HORSESHOE is a favourite in combination with other subjects. Aubrey, in his "Miscellanies," p. 148, says :—

"It is a very common thing to nail horseshoes on the thresholds of doors, which is to hinder the power of witches that enter into the house. Most houses of the West End of London have the horseshoe on the threshold ; it should be a horseshoe that one finds."

Elsewhere he says :—

"Under the Porch of Staninfield Church in Suffolk, I saw a tile with a

* Lloyd's Evening Post, Jan. 16-19, 1761.

one of those reckless deeds of bloodshed so common in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries :—

"Captain Carlo Fantom, a Croatian, spake 13 languages, was a captain under the Erle of Essex. He had a world of cuts about his body with swords and was very quarrelsome and a great ravisher. He met coming late at night out of the Horseshoe Tavern in Drury Lane with a lieutenant of Colonel Rossiter, who had great jingling spurs on. Said he, the noise of your spurs doe offend me, you must come over the kennel and give me satisfaction. They drew and passed at each other, and the lieutenant was runne through and died in an hour or two, and it was not known who killed him."*

This tavern was still in existence in 1692, as appears from the deposition of one of the witnesses in the murder of Mountfort the actor by Captain Hill, who, with his accomplice, Lord Mohun, whilst they were laying in wait for Mrs Bracegirdle, drank a bottle of canary which had been bought at the Horseshoe Tavern.

The THREE HORSESHOES are not uncommon ; and the single shoe may be met with in many combinations, arising from the old belief in its lucky influences : thus the HORSE AND HORSESHOE was the sign of William Warden, at Dover, in the seventeenth century, as appears from his token. The SUN AND HORSESHOE is still a public-house sign in Great Tichfield Street, and the MAGPIE AND HORSESHOE may be seen carved in wood in Fetterlane ; the magpie is perched within the horseshoe, a bunch of grapes being suspended from it. The HORNS AND HORSESHOE is represented on the token of William Grainge in Gutterlane, 1666,—a horseshoe within a pair of antlers. The LION AND HORSESHOE appears in the following advertisement of a shooting match :—

"ON FRIDAY the 16th of this instant, at two in the afternoon, will be a plate to be (sic) shot for, at twenty-five guineas value, in the Artillerie Ground near Moorfields. No gun to exceed four feet and a half in the barrel, the distance to be 200 yards, and but one shot a piece, the nearest the centre to win. No person that shoots to be less than one guinea, but as many more as he pleases to compleat the sum. The money to be put in the hands of Mr Jones, at the Lion and Horseshoe Tavern, or Mr Turog, gunsmith in the Minories. Note, that if any gentleman has a mind to shoot for the whole, there is a person will shoot with him for it, being left out by mistake in our last."†

The HOOP AND HORSESHOE on Towerhill, was formerly called the Horseshoe. This, like every old tavern, has its murder to record :—

"The last week one Colonel John Scott took an occasion to kill one

* Aubrey, Anecdotes and Traditions, p. 8.

† Postman, June 1703.

soever slayeth Cain ; Noah had to take 7 males and females of every clean beast, 7 males and females of every fowl of the air, for in 7 days it would begin to rain ; the ark rested in the 7th month, &c., &c. From this the middle ages borrowed their predilection for this number, and its cabalistic power.*

Horned cattle are just as common as horses on the signboards ; the BULL, in particular, is a favourite with the nation, whether as a namesake—so much so, indeed, as to have given it a popular name abroad—or as the source of the favourite roast-beef, or from the ancient sport of bull-baiting, it is difficult to say. From Ben Jonson we gather that there was another reason which sometimes dictated the choice of this animal on the signboard. In the “Alchymist” he introduces a shopkeeper, who wishes the learned Doctor to provide him with a sign.

“Face. What say you to his Constellation, Doctor, the Balance ?

Sub. No, that is stale and common :

A Townsman born in Taurus gives the Bull

Or the Bull's head : in Aries, the Ram,

A poor device.”—ALCHYMIST, a. ii. s. i.

Newton dates a letter from “the Bull,” at Shoreditch, September 1693 ; it is addressed to Locke, and a curious letter it is, containing an apology for having wished Locke dead.

The Bull is generally represented in his natural colour, black, white, grey, pied, “spangled” (in Yorkshire,) and only rarely red and blue ; yet these two last colours may simply imply the natural red, brown, and other common hues, for newspapers of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries often contain advertisements about blue dogs ; and whatever shade that was intended for, it may certainly with as much justice be applied to a bull as to a dog. The CHAINED BULL at North Allerton, Leeds, and the BULL AND CHAIN, Langworthgate, Lincoln, doubtless refer to the old cruel pastime of bull-baitings. Occasionally we meet also with a WILD BULL, as at Gisburn, near Skipton.

Leigh Hunt observes :—“London has a modern look to the inhabitants ; but persons who come from the country find as odd and remote-looking things in it as the Londoners do in York and Chester ; and among these are a variety of old inns with corridors running round the yard. They are well worth a glance from anybody who has a respect for old times.” Such a one is the

* Hence we have 7 ages, 7 churches, 7 champions, 7 penitential psalms, 7 sleepers of Ephesus, 7 years' apprenticeship, 7 cardinal virtues and deadly sins, 7 make a gallowsful, boots of 7 leagues, 7 liberal arts, and innumerable other instances.

When money's gone, and credit's bad,
It's that which makes the Bull run mad."

The famous OLD PIED BULL INN, Islington, was pulled down circa 1827, the house having existed from the time of Queen Elizabeth. The parlour retained its original character to the last. There was a chimney-piece containing Hope, Faith, and Charity, with a border of cherubims, fruit and foliage, whilst the ceiling in stucco represented the five senses. Sir Walter Raleigh is said to have been an inhabitant of this house.

"This conjecture is somewhat strengthened by the nature of the border [in a stained glass window,] which was composed of seahorses, mermaids, parrots, &c., forming a most appropriate allusion to the character of Raleigh, as a great navigator, and discoverer of unknown countries; and the bunch of green leaves [two seahorses supporting a bunch of green leaves,] has been generally asserted to represent the tobacco plant, of which he is said to have been the first importer into this country."*

At what time the house was converted into an inn does not appear. The sign of the Pied Bull in stone relief, on the front towards the south, bore the date 1730, which was probably the year this addition was made to the building. That it was an inn in 1665, appears from the following episode of the Plague-time:

"I remember one citizen, who, having thus broken out of his house in Aldersgate Street, or there about, went along the road to Islington. He attempted to have gone in at the Angel Inn, and after that at the White Horse, two inns known still by the same signs, but was refused; after which he came to the Pied Bull, an inn also still continuing the same sign. He asked them for lodging for one night only, pretending to be going into Lincolnshire, and assuring them of his being very sound, and free from the infection, which also at that time had not reached much that way. They told him they had no lodging, that they could spare but one bed up in the garret, and that they could spare that bed but for one night, some drovers being expected the next day with cattle; so if he would accept of that lodging, he might have it, which he did; so a servant was sent up with a candle with him, to show him the room. He was very well dressed, and looked like a person not used to lie in a garret; and when he came to the room he fetched a deep sigh, and said to the servant, 'I have seldom lain in such a lodging as this;' however, the servant assured him again that they had no better. 'Well,' says he, 'I must make shift; this is a dreadful time, but it is but for one night.' So he sat down upon the bed-side, and bade the maid, I think it was, fetch him up a pint of warm ale. Accordingly the servant went for the ale; but some hurry in the house, which perhaps employed her otherwise, put it out of her head, and she went up no more to him. The next morning, seeing no appearance of the gentleman, somebody in the house asked the servant that had showed him up stairs, what was become of him. She started; 'alas,' said she, 'I never thought more of him; he bade me carry him some warm ale, but I

* Lewis's Islington, p. 160.

the second attired or, &c.; in Holland a carved bull's head is always a leather-seller's sign. At the BULL'S HEAD, in Clare-market, the artists' club used to meet, of which Hogarth was a member, and Dr Ratcliffe a constant visitor. The Bull's Head was already used in signs three hundred years ago, as we may see from an entry in Machyn's Diary, which does not say much for the morality of the period:—

"The xij day of June (1560) dyd ryd in a care * abowt London ij men and ij women; one man, for he was the bowd and to brynge women unto strangers; and on women was the wyff of the Bell in Gracyous Strett; and a-nodur the wyff of the Bull-hed besyd London Stone, and boyth were bawdes and hores and the thodur man and the woman were brodur and syster and wher taken nakyd together."

As a variation, on the Bull's Head there is the Cow's FACE:—

"GEORGE TURNIDGE, aged about 16, a short thickset Lad with a little dark brown Hair, a scar in his left cheek under his eye, wears a canvass jacket lined with red and canvass Breeches, with a red cap, run away from his Master the 7th instant. Whoever secures him and gives Notice to Mr Henry Davis, Waxehandler at the Cow's Face in Miles Lane in Canon Street, shall have a Guinea Reward, and reasonable charges."
—London Gazette, Jan. 13-17, 1697.

THE BULL'S NECK is a sign at Penny Hill, Holbeach, and the BUFFALO HEAD is common in many places. The latter was the sign of one of the coffee-houses near the Exchange, during the South Sea bubble, and was hung up over the head quarters of a company for a grand dispensary, capital £3,000,000. The rage for joint-stock companies had come to such a pitch at that period, that an advertisement appeared stating:—

"THIS DAY the 8th instant at Sam's Coffeehouse behind the Royal Exchange, at three in the afternoon, a book will be opened, for entering into a joint copartnership for carrying on a thing that will turn to the advantage of those concerned."

Not less than £28,000,000 were asked for at that period to enter upon various speculations. At the Buffalo Head Tavern, Charing Cross, Duncan Campbell, the deaf and dumb fortune-teller, used at one time to deliver his oracles. He is immortalised in the Spectator, No. 474, where, in answer to the letter of a lady inquiring about Duncan's address, a note is entered, "That the

* This riding in a cart was a very ancient punishment, probably introduced by the Normans; in the romance of Lancelot du Lac the cart is mentioned with the following remarks:—"At that time a cart was considered so vile that nobody ever went into it, but those who had lost all honour and good name; and when a person was to be degraded, he was made to ride in a cart, for a cart served at that time for the same purpose as the pillory now-a-days, and each town had only one of them." In the old English laws it was called the Tumbrill; thus Edward I. in 1240 enacted a law by which millers stealing corn were to be chastised by the Tumbrill.—See Fabian's Chronicles, 2 Edw. I.

X bull was tied when being baited, in allusion to the stout stick formerly used in bed-making to smooth the clothes in their place. The BULL AND SWAN, High Street, Stamford, may be heraldic, both these animals being badges of the York family; but the Swan in all probability was the first sign, the Bull being added on account of the singular custom of Bull Running, which yearly took place, both at Tamworth and Stamford, on St John's eve. THE BULL IN THE POUND, is the Bull punished for trespass, and put in the pound or pinfold; whilst the BULL AND OAK at Wicker, Sheffield, (at Market Bosworth there is a house with the sign of the BULL IN THE OAK,) may have originated from the sign of "the Bull" being suspended from an oak tree, or referring to an oak tree standing near the house. Bulls are often tied to trees or posts in pastures, and this also may have given rise to the sign.

Visitors to the Isle of Wight will have noticed the word BUGLE frequently inscribed under the picture of a Bull on the inn signboards there. Bugle is a provincial name in those parts for a wild bull. It is an old English word, and is used by Sir John Mandeville; "hornes of grete oxen, or of bugles, or of kygn." It was still current in the seventeenth century, for Randle Holme, 1688, classes the "Bugle, or Bubalus," amongst "the savage beasts of the greater sort." The horns of this animal, used as a musical instrument, gave a name to the Buglehorn. It may be remarked that the term bugle doubtless came, in old times, with other Gallicisms common to Sussex and Hampshire, from across the Channel, where the word bugle is still preserved in the verb beugler, the common French word for the lowing of cattle.

The OX is rather uncommon; the DURHAM OX and the CRAVEN OX, two famous breeds, are sometimes met with; then there is a CRAVEN OX HEAD, in George Street, York, and a GREY OX at Brighouse, in the West Riding. The OX AND COMPASSES at Poulton Swindon, in Cumberland, is evidently a jocular imitation of the London sign of the Goat and Compasses.

The COW is more common; its favourite colours being RED, BROWN, WHITE, SPOTTED, SPANGLED, &c. The RED COW occurs as a sign near Holborn Conduit, on the seventeenth century trades tokens. It also gave a name to the alehouse in Anchor and Hope Lane, Wapping, in which Lord Chancellor Jeffries was taken prisoner, disguised as a sailor, and trying to escape to the Continent after the abdication of James II. Thinking himself equal if not to eclipse. This tavern was the famous mart for libels and lampoons; one Julyan, a drunken dissipated "secretary to the Muses," as he calls himself, was the chief manufacturer.

Near Marlborough, Wilts, there is an alehouse having the sign of the RED COW, with the following rhyme:—

"The Red Cow Gives good Milk now."

That under a BROWN COW at Oldham is still more sublime:—

"This Cow gives such Liquor,
'Twould puzzle a Viccar (sic.)"

The Heifer is to be met with sometimes in Yorkshire, but always with some local adjective, as the CRAVEN HEIFER; the AIRES-DALE HEIFER, the DURHAM HEIFER, &c. The PIED CALF at Spalding seems to present a solitary instance of a calf on the sign-board. Neither are sheep very common; the RAM was a noted carrier's inn in the seventeenth century, in West Smithfield, and, indeed, continued as such until the recent destruction of this old cattle market. The crest of the cloth-workers was a mount vert, thereon a ram statant; so that this sign in that locality was very well chosen, being in honour of the cattle-dealers on ordinary occasions, and serving for the cloth-workers in the time of Bartholomew fair, for whose benefit the fair was founded. In 1668 there were two RAM'S HEAD inns in Fenchurch Street; one of them was a carriers' inn for the Essex people. The RAM'S SKIN, which occurs at Spalding in Lincolnshire, is another name for the Fleece. The BLACK TUP figures on a sign near Rochdale, perhaps in allusion to the black ram frail matrons used to bestride in the old custom of Free Bench, thus related in Jacob's "Law Dictionary":—

"In the manors of East and West-Enbourne in the Co. of Berks, and the manor of Torre in Devonshire, and other parts of the West of England, there is a custom, that when a Copyhold Tenant dies his widow shall have 'Free Bench' in all his customary lands 'dum sola et casta fuerit,' but if she commits incontinency she forfeits her estate. Yet nevertheless on her coming into the court of the manor, riding backwards on a black ram with his tail in her hand and saying the words following, the steward is bound by the custom to readmit her to her free bench; The words are these:—

Here I am
Riding upon a Black Ram
Like a w——e as I am;
And for my crincum crancum
I have lost my binzum bancum;

Mr Fert, a dancing-master, and author of a work called "A Discourse or Explanation of the ground of Dancing."*

If we except the heraldic Blue Boar, and the Sow and Pigs, we shall find no other pigs on the signboard but the PIG AND WHISTLE,† the LITTLE PIG at Amblecote, Stourbridge, and the HOG IN THE POUND in Oxford Street, jocularly called the gentleman in trouble. This latter was formerly a starting-point for coaches, and became notorious through the crime committed by its landlady, Catherine Hayes. Having formed an illicit connexion, she was induced by her paramour to murder her husband, after which she cut off his head, put it in a bag, and threw it in the Thames. It floated ashore, and was put on a pole in St Margaret's Churchyard, Westminster, in order that it might be recognised; and by this primitive means the murderess was detected. The man was hanged, and Catherine burnt alive at Tyburn in 1726.

The GOAT is not very common; there was a Goat Inn at Hammersmith, taken down in 1826, and rebuilt under the name of Suspension Bridge Inn; up to that time, the sign, and the woodwork from which it was suspended, used to extend across the street. The GOAT IN BOOTS, on the Fulham Road,† was in old times called simply "the Goat." Besides these, there is a BLACK GOAT in Lincoln, and a GREY GOAT in Penrith and Carlisle, and a few others without addition of colour.

A walk through town on a fine Sunday morning will at once convince anybody of the good understanding that exists between the Englishmen and the canine species, "l'ami de l'homme" as Buffon calls the dog. From every lane and alley in the lower parts of the town sally forth men and youths in clean moleskins and corduroys, each invariably accompanied by some yelping cur, the least of whose faults is to be ugly. It is no wonder, then, that the DOG should be of frequent occurrence on the signboard. Pepys mentions a tavern of that name in Westminster, where, about the time of the Restoration, he used occasionally to show his merry face. In 1768, the author of the "Art of Living in London," recommended the Dog in Holywell Street for a quiet good dinner:—

"Where disencumbered of all form or show,
We to a moment might or sit or go;
Eat what the palate recommends us hot,
Yet not considered as a useless guest."

* Postman, Feb. 13, 1711.

† See under HUMOROUS SIGNS, further on.

Tokens are extant of the PIED DOG in Seething Lane, 1667, a sign still frequently to be seen at the present day.

We very rarely meet with the BLUE DOG; but there is an example in Grantham, and the sign occurs in a few other places.

Sometimes a peculiar breed is chosen, as the SETTER DOG at Redford, Notts; the POINTER at Peckfield, Milford Junction; the BEAGLE at Shute, Axminster, and the MERRY HARRIERS, common in hunting counties. Equally common is the GREYHOUND, particularly in the North country, where coursing has long been a favourite sport. In the seventeenth century, it was the sign of a fashionable tavern in London, for in a sprightly ballad in the Roxburgh collection,* a young gallant is introduced who is going to forsake his evil courses and turn over a new leaf. He gives a last farewell to all his doxies :

"Farewell unto black patches,
And farewell powder'd locks;"

and remembers all those delightfully wicked places he used to haunt formerly, and amongst them :

"Farewell unto the GREYHOUND,
And farewell to the Bell,
And farewell to my landlady,
Whom I do love so well."

This was probably the same Greyhound mentioned by Machyn, which seems to have been situated in Fleet Street, where the gaudily dressed Spanish ambassador took his stirrup-cup before leaving London. The same author mentions the sign elsewhere, apparently in Westminster; and the little picture of manners which accompanies it is rather curious :—

"The viij day of January (1557) dyd ryd in a care in Westmynster the wyff of the Grayhound, and the Abbot's servand was wyppd [whipped] because that he toke her owt of the car, at the care h—e, [the back of the cart.]"

—another example that the course of true love never does run smooth, even though it runs upon wheels.

The WHITE GREYHOUND was the sign of John Harrison, in St Paul's Churchyard, a bookseller who published some of Shakespeare's early works, as "The Rape of Lucrece," "Venus and Adonis," &c. White greyhounds, or rather silver greyhounds, were, until eighty years ago, the badges worn on the arm by king's messengers.

* The Merry Man's Resolution, or his last farewell to his former acquaintance. Box Ball. iii. f. 242.

A publican at Odell has chosen the MAD DOG for a sign, evidently his beau idéal of a "jolly fellow," one having a great horror for water; another at Pidley, Hunts, not to be behindhand with the Mad Dog, has put up the MAD CAT. We have as odd and apparently as unmeaning a sign in Tabernacle Walk, namely, the BARKING DOGS.

All the combinations of the sign of the Dog point towards sports, as the DOG AND BEAR, which was very common in the seventeenth century, when bear-baiting was in fashion, and kings and queens countenanced it by their presence. The DOG AND DUCK refers to another barbarous pastime, when ducks were hunted in a pond by spaniels. The pleasure consisted in seeing the duck make her escape from the dog's mouth by diving. It was much practised in the neighbourhood of London till the beginning of this century, when it went out of fashion, as most of the ponds were gradually built over. One of the most notorious DOG AND DUCK Taverns stood in St George's Fields, where Bethlem Hospital now stands; it had a long room with tables and benches, and an organ* at the upper end. In its last days it was frequented only by thieves, prostitutes, and other low characters. After a long and wicked existence it was at length put down by the magistrates. In the seventeenth century it was famous for springs, but already in Garrick's time its reputation was very equivocal:

"St George's Fields, with taste and fashion struck, Display Arcadia at the Dog and Duck,
And Drury Misses, here in tawdry pride,
Are there "Pastoras" by the fountain side;
To frowzy bowers they reel through midnight damps,
With Fauns half drunk and Dryads breaking lamps."†

In an unpublished paper from the MS. collection of William Hone, we have a mention of it:—

"It was a very small public-house till Hedger's mother took it, who had been a barmaid to a tavern-keeper in London, who left this house to her at his death. Her son Hedger then was a postboy to a yard I believe at Epsom, and came to be master there. After making a good deal of money he left the house to his nephew, one Miles, (though it still went in Hedger's name,) who was to allow him £1000 per annum out of the profits,

* Organs were first introduced in taverns during the Commonwealth. When the liturgy and the use of organs in Divine service were abolished, these instruments being removed from churches, were set up in inns and taverns. Hence a pamphlet of 1659 has these words:—"They have translated the organs out of their churches and set them up in taverns, chaunting their dithy rambics and bestial Bacchanalias to the tune of those instruments which were wonted to assist them in the celebration of God's praises."

† Garrick's Prologue to the Maid of the Oaks, 1774.

cutler's shop, and put up a double sign, representing on the one side a red cat, on the other a portrait of his Eminence Cardinal Mazarin in his red gown, and with his bristling moustache; underneath he wrote "aux deux méchantes bêtes," (the two obnoxious animals. Holland, however, was at peace with France at that time, and so the Burgomaster, afraid of offending the French ambassador, requested Bertrand to alter his sign. Mazarin's face was then painted out and another red cat put in its place. Gradually as the first sign was forgotten, the name became unmeaning, and was finally altered into the Red Cat, and in this shape it has come down to the present day, still the sign of a cutler, and a descendant of Bertrand.*

The CAT AND LION, which we meet with sometimes, as at Stockport, was probably at one time the Tiger and Lion. It is occasionally accompanied by the following elegant distich:—

"The lion is strong, the cat is vicious,
My ale is strong, and so is my liquors."

The CAT AND PARROT was, in 1612, the sign of Thomas Pauer, a bookseller, dwelling near the Royal Exchange. At Santry, near Dublin, and in some other places, we meet with the CAT AND CAGE, which is represented by a cat trying to pull a bird out of a cage; but its origin may be found in the CAT IN THE BASKET, a favourite sign of the booths on the Thames when that river was frozen over in 1738. The sign was a living one, a basket hanging outside the booth, with a cat in it. It was revived when the river was again frozen in 1789, and seems to have had many imitators, for on a print † representing a view of the river at Rotherithe during the frost, there is a booth with a merry company within, whose sign, inscribed the Original CAT IN THE CAGE, represents poor Tabby in a basket. This sign of the Cat in the Basket, or in the Cage, doubtless originated from the cruel game, once practised by our ancestors, of shooting at a cat in a basket. Brand, in his "Popular Superstitions," gives a quotation, from which it appears that a similar cruel sport was still practised at Kelso in 1789; but instead of shooting at the cat, it was placed in a barrel, the bottom of which had to be beaten out. The same game is still practised in Holland, and generally, if not always, on the ice.

* La Haye, par de Fonseca. 1863.

† Crowle Pennant, vol. viii.

Russian by birth, who advertised it wholesale at 50s., and retail at £3 the ounce. Ambrose Godfrey was his successor.

Not only apothecaries used this emblem, but all kinds of shops adopted it. In the time of James I. it was the sign of one of the places where plays were acted in Drury Lane,—sometimes also called the Cockpit Theatre. This was destroyed by the unruly apprentices during one of their saturnalia. Being rebuilt, it was sacked a second time by the Parliamentary soldiers. In Charles II.'s piping times of peace Killigrew's troop of "the king's servants" played in it, until they removed to the theatre in Lincoln's Inn.

The character ascribed to the PELICAN was fully as fabulous as that of the Phoenix. From a clumsy, gluttonous, piscivorous water-bird, it was transformed into a mystic emblem of Christ, whom Dante calls "nostro Pellicano." St Hieronymus gives the story of the pelican restoring its young ones destroyed by serpents, as an illustration of the destruction of man by the old serpent, and his salvation by the blood of Christ. The "Bestiarius," in the Royal Library at Brussels, says:—

"Physiologus dist del Pellican qu'il aime moult ses oiseles et quant ils sont nés et creu ils s'esbanoient en lor ni contre lor pere et le fierent de lors eles en ventillant ensi come il li vont entor et tant le fierent qu'ils le blechent es ex. Et lors les refiert li peres et les occit. Et la mere est de tel nature que ele vient al ni al tierc jor et s'accoste sor ses oiselès mors et ell oevre son costé de son bec et en espant son sanc sor ses oiseles et ensi les resucite de mort; car li oiseles par nature rechoivent le sang si toit come il saut de la mere et le boivent."*

In the Armory of Birds by Skelton, a similar notion is expressed:

"Than sayd the Pellycane,
When my Byrds be slayne,
With my Bloude I them reuyue,
Scrypture doth record
The same dyd our Lord,
And rose from deth to lyue."

There is still an old stone carving of the Pelican walled in the front of a house in Aldermanbury, and as a sign the bird appears to be a great favourite at the present day. An anecdote is told of Jekyl's dissatisfaction at the prices at the Pelican Inn, Speen-

* "Physiologus tells us that the Pelican is very fond of his young ones, and when they are born and begin to grow, they rebel in their nest against their parent and strike him with their wings, flying about him and beat him so much till they wound him in his eyes. Then the father strikes again and kills them. And the mother is of such a nature that she comes back to the nest on the third day and sits down upon her dead young ones, and opens her side with her bill and pours her blood over them, and so resuscitates them from death, for the young ones by their instinct receive the blood as soon as it comes out of the mother, and drink it."—Bibl. Nat. Belg. No. 10074.

This house was built in 1653, and has preserved much of its original appearance. In 1711 the RAVEN or the BLACK RAVEN was the sign of S. Popping, bookseller in Paternoster Row; and about the same time John Dunton published at the BLACK RAVEN, in the Poultry, the earliest printed review of literary works, under the name of "Literature from the North, and News from all Nations." What the work was worth we may judge from D'Israeli's description of the man: "a crack-brained, scribbling bookseller, who boasted he had a thousand projects, fancied he had methodised six hundred, and was ruined by the fifty he executed." Notwithstanding this, his autobiography, under the name of the "Life and Errors of John Dunton," is one of the most curious works in existence. In Molesworth Street, Dublin, there is a sign of the THREE RAVENS, which may be called a living sign, for there are always some ravens kept on the premises. The Raven was the badge of the old Scotch kings, and thus may have been adopted as a kind of Jacobite symbol. To this may be attributed its frequency on the signboard as well as some other sable birds. The common occurrence of the BLACKBIRD and the COCK AND BLACKBIRD as signs had long puzzled us, till one day turning over some old Scotch ballads we came upon one, which Allan Ramsay gives as a favourite old Scotch song. We shall merely quote the first two stanzas, (there are six in all,)—quite sufficient, as far as the poetry is concerned:—

"Upon a fair morning for soft recreation,
 I heard a fair lady was making her moan,
 With sighing and sobbing, and sad lamentation,
 Saying, my blackbird most royal is flown."
 My thoughts they deceive me,
 Reflections do grieve me,
 And am o'erburthen'd with sad misery.
 Yet if death should blind me,
 As true love inclines me,
 My blackbird I'll seek out wherever he be.
 "Once in fair England my blackbird did flourish,
 He was the chief blackbird that in it did spring,
 Prime ladies of honour his person did nourish,
 Because he was the true son of a king.
 But since that false fortune,
 Which still is uncertain,
 Has caused this parting between him and me,
 His name I'll advance,
 In Spain and in France,
 And I'll seek out my blackbird wherever he be."

before; yet I have much read of admirable things of them, in Aelianus the Polyhistor, and other historians, even Storcken, which do much haunt many cities and towns of the Netherlands, especially in the sommer. For in Flushing, a towne of Zeland, I saw some of them, those men esteeming themselves happy in [on] whose houses they harbour, and those most unhappy whom they forsake. It is written of them that when the old one is become so old that it is not able to helpe itselfe, the young one purveyeth foode for it, and sometime carryeth it about on his backe, and if it seeth it so destitute of meate, that it knoweth not where to get any sustenance, it casteth out that which it hath eaten the day before, to the end to feede his damme. This bird is called in Greeke παραργός where hence cometh the Greeke word ἀντιπαραργέω which signifieth to imitate the stork in cherishing our parents.”*

This fabled virtue of the stork suggested the sign to many Continental booksellers and printers. The Two STORKS was the sign of Martin Nutius of Antwerp, 1550, and his son, Philip Nutius. Their colophons, which were varied continually, all represent a young stork feeding an old one, sometimes carrying him on his back, with the motto: “PIETAS HOMINI. TUTISSIMA. VIRTUS.” A similar sign was used, circa 1682, by Franciscus Canisius; and, in 1651, by Joan. Bapt. Verdussen, both of Antwerp. The Parisian booksellers adopted it as well, for we find it on the titlepages of Sebastien Nivelles, and of Sebastien Cramoisy, the king’s printer, of the Rue St Jacques, 1636. He used a Scripture motto with it: “HONORA PATREM TUUM ET MATREM TUAM UT SIS LONGÆVUS SUPER TERRAM, Ecc. xx.” In the Banks’ Collection of Bills there is one of the STORK HOTEL at Basle, of the end of the last century. It gives the address in four languages. The English stands thus:—Christophe Imhoff, “a the Seigne off the Storgk at Basel.”

The THREE CRANES was formerly a favourite London sign. With the usual jocularity of our forefathers, an opportunity for punning could not be passed, so instead of the three cranes, which in the vintry used to lift the barrels of wine, three birds were represented. The Three Cranes in Thames Street, or in the vicinity, was a famous tavern as early as the reign of James I. It was one of the taverns frequented by the wits in Ben Jonson’s time. In one of his plays he says:—

“A pox o’ these pretenders to wit, your Three Cranes, Mitre and Mermaid men! not a corn of true salt, not a grain of right mustard among them all!”—Bartholomew Fair, a. i. s. 1.

* Coryatt’s Crudities, vol. i. p. 39. In the East the same fable is current as to the paternal affection of young storks; their name in Hebrew is cheradao, which implies mercy or pity.

naturally does the time of cock-crowing shadow out these things, that probably, some good, well meaning men might have been brought to believe that the very devils themselves when the cock crew and reminded them of them did fear and tremble and shun the light." *

Ideas such as these continued a long time in the popular mind, for Aubrey tells us that in his younger days people "had some pious ejaculation too when the cock did crow, which put them in mind of y^e Trumpet at y^e Resurrection." †

One of the oldest Cock taverns in London is the COCK in Tothill Street, Westminster, lately re-christened as the COCK AND TABARD. An ancient coat of arms, carved in stone, England quartered with France, discovered in this house, is now walled up in the front of the building. In the back parlour is a jolly, bluff-looking man in a red coat, said to represent the driver of the first mail to Oxford, which started from this tavern. Tradition says that the workmen employed at the building of Westminster Abbey, in the reign of Henry VII., used to receive their wages at this house. It was formerly entered by steps; the building now exhibiting traces of great antiquity, and appears at one time to have been a house of considerable pretensions. The rafters and timber are principally of cedar wood. There is a curious hiding-place on the staircase, and a massive carving of Abraham about to offer his son Isaac; and another, in wood, representing the Adoration of the Magi, said to have been left in pledge, at some remote period, for an unpaid score. The cock may have been adopted as a sign here on account of the vicinity of the Abbey, of which St Peter was the patron, for in the middle ages a cock crowing on the top of a pillar was often one of the accessories in a picture of the apostle. This certainly was a very unkind allusion for the poor saint, particularly when accompanied with such a sneering rhyme as that under the sign of the RED COCK in Amsterdam in 1682. On the one side was written:—

"Doe de Haan begost te kraayen Toen begost Petrus te schraayen."

On the reverse:—

"De haan die kraait niet by ongeval Vraagt Petrus die't U zeggen zal." ‡

* Bourne's Observations on Popular Antiquities, 1725, p. 65.

† Aubrey's Remains of Gentilisme and Judaism.—Lansdown MSS.

‡ On the obverse:—

"When the cock began to crow
St Peter began to cry."

Reverse:—

"The cock does not crow for nothing;
Ask St Peter, he can tell you."

spicuous in gilt over the door, is said to have been carved by no less a hand than Grinling Gibbons. During the plague time of 1665, the following advertisement appeared in the Intelligencer :—

"THIS is to certify that the Master of the Cock and Bottle, commonly called the Cock alehouse, at Temple Bar, hath dismissed his servants and shut up his house for this long vacation, intending (God willing) to return at Michaelmass next so that all persons who have any accounts or farthings belonging to the said house are desired to repair thither before the 8th of this instant July and they shall receive satisfaction."

Certainly those were dull times, and well might that fashionable establishment close for the "long vacation," for the plague was then coming to its highest pitch; all the gallant customers had fled town, and according to Defoe's computation, "not less than 10,000 houses were forsaken of the inhabitants in the city and suburbs :"—

"There was not so much velvet stirring as would have bene a cover to a little booke in octavo, or seamde a Lieftenant's Buff-doublet; a French hood would have been more wondered at in London, than the Polonyans with their long-tayld Gaberdynes; and, which was most lamentable, there was never a Gilt spur to be seene all the Strand over, never a feather wagging in all Fleet Streete, vnlesse some country Fore-horse came by, by meere chance with a Raine-beaten Feather in his costrill; the streete looking for all the world like a Sunday morning at six o'Clocke, three hours before service, and the Bells ringing all about London, as if the Coronation day had bene a half a yeare long."*

But there was a good time coming after the plague and fire, when troops of gay courtiers might quaff their wine and sparkling ale, as happy as the "merry monarch" himself. Amongst them, our friend Pepys, who informs us, that on the 23d of April 1668, he went "by water to the Temple, and then to the Cock alehouse, and drank and eat a lobster, and sang, and mighty merry. So almost night, I carried Mrs Pierce home, and then Kuipp and I to the Temple again and took boat, it being darkish, and to Foxhall, it being now night, and a bonfire burning at Lambeth for the king's coronation day."

Exactly one hundred years later, the Cock is named with encomiums on its porter, in the "Art of Living in London;" but it is to be hoped the porter was better than the poetry :—

"Nor think the Cock with these not on a par,
The celebrated Cock of Temple Bar,
Whose Porter best of all bespeaks its praise,
Porter that's worthy of the Poet's lays."†

* Meeting of Gallants at an Ordinarie. London, 1604. Percy Society, 1841. Though this is a description of the state of London in 1603, it perfectly applies to the plague of 1665.

† The Art of Living in London. Poem in 2 cantos, 1768.

HAVE AT IT; his token representing a man about to throw a stick at a cock. This cruel game was very common in alehouses in former times; the whole sport consisting in throwing a stick at an unfortunate cock tied to a stake; if the animal was killed it was the thrower's property; if not, he forfeited the small sum paid for each "shy." What a slaughter of cocks was carried on in this way may be judged from the following :—

"Last Tuesday a Brewer's servant in Southwark took his walk round Towerhill, Moorfield, and Lincoln's Inn Fields, and knocked down so many cocks that by selling them again, he returned home twenty shillings odd pence richer man than he came out."*

Medals are extant of the reign of William III., on which John Bull is represented throwing sticks at the French cock: not a very lofty allegory, it must be confessed; but in those days the public taste was not very refined; thus, after the victory of Blenheim, the simile was in equal bad taste, the same idea being expressed by a huge lion tearing an unfortunate cock in pieces.

Cock-fighting was a favourite diversion with the Romans, and we find continual traces of it during their occupation here. Fitz-Stephen says, it was the sport of schoolboys in his time; but as they grew up it seems the taste adhered to them. That sturdy bluebeard-king, Henry VIII., though always ready to chop off the heads of his subjects, felt his heart melt at the miseries of the cocks, and made edicts against cock-fights, yet with the inconsistency that marked his other tastes built a cock-pit unto himself at Whitehall. James I., also, was a great amateur. Though habitually suppressed by various sovereigns, the evil would always break out again, till it was finally abolished by an Act of Parliament in the 12 & 13 Queen Victoria. In Staffordshire, and other counties where this sport is still practised "on the sly," the FIGHTING COCKS is a favourite sign.

The cock occurs in innumerable combinations with all kinds of heterogeneous objects, many of which seem merely selected for their oddity: among the most explicable is the Cock and Bottle, of which we have offered a solution, (p. 207) and which again occurs in the following title :—

"JUST PUBLISHED,

"A full account of the Life and Visions of Nicholas Hart who has every year in his Life past, on the 5th of August, fall'n into a Deep Sleep and cannot be awaked till 5 Days and Nights are expired, and then gives a surprising Relation of what he hath seen in the other World. Taken from

* Protestant Mercury, Feb. 14, 1700.

The COCK AND BREECHES originated in a favourite form of gilt gingerbread at Bartholomew Fair, although the very objectionable anecdote of Joe Miller concerning such a sign is generally believed to have had something to do with its origin.

The COCK AND BULL is still frequently seen, but though the meaning of the phrase is well understood, neither its origin, nor the meaning of the two animals on the signboard, have as yet been properly explained. As we have no sound theory to offer, we shall abstain from entering on the subject, for fear of giving an illustration of what a cock-and-bull story is, rather than clearing up the mystery of the signboard. It occurs amongst the seventeenth century trades tokens.

The COCK AND DOLPHIN was the sign of one of the London carriers' inns :—

"JAMES NEVIL'S Coach to Hampstead comes to the Cock and Dolphin in Gray's Inn Lane, in and out every day."—De Laune's Present State of London, 1681.

Hatton, in 1708, placed this inn "on the east side of Gray's Inn Lane, near the middle." At the present day it is a public-house sign in Kendal, Westmoreland. It is more likely to be a combination of two signs, than to refer to the French Cock and the Dolphin in the arms of the Dauphin. The same applies to the COCK AND ANCHOR in Gateshead and Dublin; the COCK AND SWAN, and the COCK AND CROWN, both in Wakefield; and the COCK AND BEAR at Nuneaton; whilst the COCK AND HOUSE in Norwich may originally have been the cocking-house of the district,—that is, the house where cock-fights were held.

Fully as general as the sign of the Cock is that of the SWAN; the reason why, is perhaps truly, though coarsely, expressed under an old Dutch signboard :—

"De Swaan voert ieder kroeg, zoowel in dorp als stad, Om dat hy altyd graag is met de bek in't nat."*

Not only is there a conformity of æsthetic symbolism in various parts of Europe, observable in the constant recurrence of the same objects on signboards, but even the same jokes are found. Thus the Swan at Bandon, near Cork, has the following rhymes, nearly akin to the Dutch epigram above, but strongly flavoured with Hibernian wit :—

"This is the Swan
That left her pond,

* "The reason why so many alehouses in town and country have the sign of the swan, is because that bird is so fond of liquid."

[No English translation can convey the peculiar significance of the original. The above gives only the bare sense.]

To Dip her Bill in porter,
 Why not we,
 As well as she Become regular Topers."

Another Milesian at Mallow, also near Cork, has it thus modified :—

"This is the Swan that dips her neck in Water,
 Why not we as well as she, drink plenty of Beamish and Crawford's Porter."

In London it was always a favourite sign by the river side :—

"I find the Swan to be your usual sign by the River," said I. "Why, yes," replied George. "I don't know what a Coach or a Waggon and Horses or the High-mettled Racer have to do with our River." "Pray, now," said I to my oracle, "do enumerate the signs of the Swan remaining [this was in 1829] on the Banks of the River, between London and Battersea Bridges." "Why, let me see, Master, there's the Old Swan at London Bridge, that's one—there's the Swan in Arundel Street, two,—then ours here, (Hungerford Stairs,) three,—the Swan at Lambeth; that's down though. Well, then the Old Swan at Chelsea, but that has long been turned into a Brewhouse, though that was where our people [the Watermen] rowed to formerly, as mentioned in Doggett's will; now they row to the sign of the New Swan, beyond the Physick Garden; we'll say that's four, then there's the two Swan signs at Battersea, six."*

The Swan, by London Bridge, was a very ancient house, and gave a name to the Swan stairs. Trades tokens of this house are extant, representing a Swan walking on Old London Bridge, with the date 1657. This feat was performed by the Swan on the token, to intimate that it was the Swan above the Bridge in contradistinction to another tavern known as the Swan below the Bridge. Pepys once dined at this house; and though always very ready to be pleased, he has not much good to say about it. "27 June, 1660. Dined with my Lord and all the officers of his regiment, who invited my Lord and his friends, as many as he would bring to dinner, at the Swan at Dowgate, a poor house and ill dressed, but very good fish and plenty." The landlady of this tavern is mentioned in a curious manner in a tract printed in 1712, entitled "The Quack Vintners :"—

"May the chaste widow prosper at the Swan
 Near London Bridge, where richest wines are drawn,
 And win by her good humour and her trade,
 Some jolly son of Bacchus to her bed."

Previous to 1598 there was a SWAN THEATRE on the Bank-side, near the Globe; so named from "a house and tenement called the Swan," mentioned in a charter of Edward VI., granting the manor of Southwark to the City of London. It fell into decay in the reign of James I., was closed in 1613, and subsequently only used for gladiatorial exhibitions. Yet, in its time, it had been well frequented, for a cotemporary author says—"it was the Continent of the world, because half the year a world of beauties and brave spirits resorted to it." One of the oldest Swan signs on record is that of the old printer, Wynkyn de Worde, assistant, and finally successor to Caxton, who, in the beginning of the sixteenth century, issued some works "emprynted at the signe of the Swane in Fletestrete."

* J. T. Smith, Book for a Rainy Day, p. 280.

From an anecdote preserved by Aubrey, iii. 415, it appears that Ben Jonson did not always "go to the Devil," but was also in the habit of having his cup of sack at a Swan tavern near Charing Cross :—

"A GRACE BY BEN JONSON EXTEMPORE, BEFORE KING JAMES.

"Our king and queen, the Lord God blesse,
The Palsgrave and the Lady Besse,
And God blesse every living thing
That lives and breathes and loves the King.
God blesse the Councill of Estate,
And Buckingham the fortunate.
God blesse them all and keep them safe,
And God blesse me, and God bless Ralph.

"The king was mighty inquisitive to know who this Ralph was. Ben told him 'twas the drawer at the Swanne Taverne by Charing-crosse, who drew him good canarie. For this drollerie, his Ma^{ty} gave him an hundred poundes."

Tokens of this house of the plague year are extant, representing a Swan with a sprig in its mouth, and the inscription, "Marke Rider at the Swan against the Mewes,* 1665. His Halfe Penny."

The Swan at Knightsbridge had a reputation which we should call "fast." It was well known to young gallants, and was the terror of all such jealous husbands and fathers as the Sir David Duncce who figures in Otway's "Soldier of Fortune," 1681 :—

"I have surely lost and never shall find her more. She promised me strictly to stay at home till I came back again; for ought I know, she may be up three pairs of stairs in the Temple now, or it may be taking the air as far as Knightsbridge with some smoothfaced rogue or another; 'tis a damned house that Swan; that Swan at Knightsbridge is a confounded house!"

* The king's stables (which stood on the site now occupied by Trafalgar Square) called the "mews," because formerly his majesty's falcons were kept there, mue being a French word for a certain kind of bird-cage or coop: whence the words "mewed up."

Tom Brown also alludes to it; Peter Pindar (Dr Woolcot) commemorates a vestry dinner there:—

“At Knightsbridge at a Tavern called the Swan,
Churchwardens, Overseers, a jolly clan,
Order'd a dinner for themselves,
A very handsome dinner,” &c.

The old house was pulled down in 1788, and its name transferred to a public-house in Sloane Street, which, with three other houses, occupies the site of the old Swan.

The Swan tavern in Exchange Alley, Cornhill, was well known among the musical world in the last century. In this house, some celebrated concerts were given, at a time when there were no proper concert-rooms; they commenced in 1728, under the management of one Barton, formerly a dancing-master, and continued for twelve years, when the place was burnt down; at the rebuilding, it was christened the King's Head.

In 1825, the landlord of the Swan tavern at Stratford, near London, recommended the charms of his place in the following poetical strain:—

“At the Swan Tavern kept by Lound
The best accommodation's found,—
Wine, Spirits, Porter, Bottled Beer,
You'll find in high perfection here.
If in the Garden with your lass
You feel inclin'd to take a glass,
There Tea and Coffee of the best,
Provided is for every guest.
And females not to drive from hence,
The charge is only fifteen pence.
Or if disposed a Pipe to smoke,
To sing a song or crack a joke,
You may repair across the Green,
Where nought is heard, though much is seen.
There laugh, and drink, and smoke away,
And but a moderate reckoning pay.
Which is a most important object
To every loyal British subject.

In short,
The best accommodation's found
By those who deign to visit Lound.”

The BLACK SWAN, though formerly considered a rara avis in terris, may now be seen in every town and village, swinging at the door of mine host, the picture painted just as fancy may have suggested, long before the actual bird was brought over from Australia. At the Black Swan tavern in Tower Street, the Earl

Rochester, when banished from the Court, took lodgings under the name of Alexander Bendo, his profession that of an Italian quack, and there he had those comical adventures with the waiting-maids of the Court. Hamilton says in his "Memoires de Grammont," that the adventures Rochester had in this disguise are by far the most amusing given in his works. Another Black Swan alehouse is named in a broadside of 1704 :—

"A most strange but true account of a very large sea monster that was found last Saturday in a common-shore in New Fleet Street in Spittlefields, where at the Black Swan alehouse thousands of people resort to see it," &c.

This dreadful monster was simply "a dead Porpoise of a very large size, it being above Four Foot in length, and Three Foot about," and the fact of it "leaving the deep to rove up into Fresh Water Rivers, and more especially to crawl up so far a common-shore," prognosticated, it was thought, some dire calamities, which are told in not very parliamentary language.

The SWAN WITH TWO NECKS is another lusus naturæ observable on the signboard, said to owe its origin to the corruption of the word nick into neck.* This explanation, however ingenious, is somewhat "sujet à caution," for this reason : it is a well-known and established fact that the London signs of old had no inscriptions under them. Now, considering the small size of the nicks in question, they would scarcely have been perceptible at the height on which the sign was generally suspended, and even if visible, would never have been sufficiently noticed or understood to give a name to the sign. We shall not venture to propose another solution, as nothing of a sufficiently distinct character occurs to us : but it is just possible that a sign of two sign having gained popularity as a noted landmark, or from other causes, was imitated by rivals or juniors, particularly on account of its presenting the favourite alliteration. Combinations with the sugarloaf are very common, all arising from its being the grocer's sign : thus the THREE CROWNS AND SUGARLOAF, Kidderminster; WHEATSHEAF AND SUGARLOAF, Ratcliff Highway, seventeenth century, (trades token;) TOBACCO ROLL AND SUGARLOAF, Gray's Inn Gate, Holborn;* the THREE COFFINS AND SUGARLOAF, Fleet Street, 1720.

* These nicks were little horizontal, vertical, and diagonal notches cut in the swan's bill, in order that each owner might know his own swans. In the Archæologia for 1812, a roll of 219 swan marks is given, together with the ordinances respecting swans on the river Witham, in Lincoln, belonging to various gentlemen ; this paper bears the date of June 1570. The nicking was done by swanherds, appointed by the king's licence, who kept a register of all the various marks. None but freeholders were to have marks, and these were to be perfectly distinct from those used by other gentlemen. The Corporation of London had the right of keeping swans on the Thames for fourteen leagues above and below bridge, and their flocks seem to have been very numerous, for Paulus Jovius describing the approach to London in 1552, says, "This river abounds in swans swimming in flocks, the sight of which, and their noise, are very agreeable to the fleets that meet them in their course." Those of the company of the vintners had two nicks or marks on their bill, it is said, and hence the popular explanation of the sign. This nicking of swans on the river was formerly a matter of great state. The members of the Corporation of London used annually to go up the Thames in the month of August, in gaily decorated barges, and after the swans were nicked and counted, to land off Barn Elms, and there partake of a collation in the open air, ending which, history informs us, they used to dance, but it would require very reliable authority to convince us that an alderman could find enjoyment on the "light fantastic toe," particularly after a hearty collation.

In the sign of the SWAN AND RUSHES, at Leicester, the rushes were merely a pictorial accessory, placed in the background to bring out the white plumage of the Swan, whilst the SWAN AND HELMET, at Northampton, no doubt originated from a helmet with a Swan for crest.

In one instance, a DRAKE occurs as a sign, namely, on the token of Will. Johnson, at "ye Drake in Bell Yard," near Temple Bar, 1667. The Duck is only to be seen in company with the Dog; in one instance it accompanies a Mallard. This last animal was otherwise well known to the Londoners, since in 1520, amongst "the articles of good gouvernãce of the cite of London," it was recommended to magistrates—"also ye shall enquire, yf any person kepe or norrysh hoggis, oxen, kye, or mallardis within the ward in noying of ther neyhbours."† The DUCK AND MALLARD was the sign of a lock (and probably gun-) smith in East Smithfield in 1673.‡

The PIGEON was a tavern at Charing Cross in 1675.§ The THREE PIGEONS were very common; there still exists an inn of this name at Brentford :—

"It is a house of interest as being in all likelihood one of the few haunts of Shakespeare now remaining; as being indeed the sole Elizabethan tavern existing in England, which in the absence of direct evidence, may fairly be presumed to have been occasionally visited by him." ¶

It was kept at one time by Lowin, one of the original actors in Shakespeare's plays, and is often named by the old dramatists :

"Thou art admirably suited for the Three Pigeons at Brentford. I swear I know thee not."—The Roaring Girl.

"We will turn our courage to Braynford, westward,
My Bird of the Night—to the Pigeons."

Ben Jonson's Alchymist.

* Mercurius Publicus, Aug. 30—Sept. 16, 1660.

† Arnold's Customs of London.

‡ London Gazette, October 2-6, 1673.

§ City Mercury, or Advertisements concerning Trade, Nov. 4, 1676.

¶ Halliwell's Local Illustrations to the "Merry Wives of Windsor." Folio Shakespeare.

There, also, George Peel played some of his merry pranks. In the parlour is an old painting dated 1704, representing a landlord attending to some customers seated at a table in the open air, with these lines :—

"Wee are new beginners
And thrive wee would fain,
I am honest Ralph of Reading,
My wife Susana to name."

Bat Pidgeon, the famous hairdresser, immortalised by the Speculator, lived at the sign of the Three Pigeons, "in the corner house of St Clement's Churchyard, next to the Strand." There he remained as late as 1740, when he cut the "boyish locks" of Pennant.

In 1663 it was the sign of a bookseller in St Paul's Churchyard,* and in 1698 of John Newton, also a bookseller over against Inner Temple Gate, Fleet Street.

The DOVE was the sign of a coffeehouse on the riverside, between the two malls at Fulham. "In a room in this house, Thomson wrote part of his 'Winter.' He was in the habit of frequenting the house during the winter season, when the Thames was frozen and the surrounding country covered with snow. This fact is well authenticated, and many persons visit the house to the present day."† The STOCKDOVE is a sign at Romiley, Stockport; the DOVECOTE is a public-house at Laxton, Carlton-on-Trent, probably on account of the pigeons constantly flying out and in; and there is a PIGEON BOX at Prior's Lee, near Shiffnall. The pigeon-shooting matches may have something to do with the selection of this sign.

The FALCON was another of the devices used by Wynkyn de Worde over his shop in Fleet Street. Falcon Court, in that locality, perhaps derives its name from this house. Subsequently, Gordobuc, the earliest English tragedy, was "imprynted at London, in Flete Strete, at the sign of the Faucon," no doubt Wynkyn's house, by William Griffiths in 1565; and in 1612, Peacham's "Garden of Heroical Devises" was published by Wa. Dight at the sign of the Falcon in Shoe Lane. These booksellers, perhaps, borrowed their device from the stationers' arms, which are, argent on a chevron between three bibles, or, a falcon volant between two roses, the Holy Ghost in chief; it was also a badge of some of the kings. At the Falcon inn, Stratford-on-Avon, there is still a shovelboard on which William Shakespeare is said often to have played. Another Falcon Tavern connected with Shakespeare's name used to stand on the Bankside, where he and his companions occasionally refreshed themselves after the fatigues of the performances at the Globe. It long continued celebrated as a coaching inn for all parts of Kent, Surrey, and Sussex, till it was taken down in 1808. The name is still preserved in the Falcon Glasshouse, which stands opposite its site, and in the Falcon Stairs. There was another Falcon Inn in Fleet Street, bequeathed to the company of cordwainers, by a gentleman named Fisher, under the obligation that they were yearly to have a sermon preached in the Church of St Dunstan, in the West, on the 10th of July. Formerly, on that day, sack and posset used to be drunk by those concerned, in the vestry of the church, if not to the health, at least to the "pious memory" of this Fisher; but that good custom has long since been abandoned.

* Kingdom's Intelligencer, March 30 to April 6, 1663.

† Faulkner's Account of Fulham, 1813, p. 329.

The FALCON ON THE HOOP is named in 1443. "In the xxj yer of Kyng Harry the vjth," the brotherhood of the Holy Trinity received "for the rent of ij yere of Wyllym Wylkyns for the Sarrecyn Head v li. vj s. viij d., paynge by the yer liij s. iiij d. and of the Faucon on the Hope, for the same ij yer vi li., that is to say paynge by the yer iij li." Rent, it must be confessed, seems small, and landlords exceedingly accommodating in those days. Six days before that period, there is an entry in the churchwardens' accounts for "kervyng and peinting of the seigne of the Faucon vj sh."* This mention of the sign clearly shows that it was not a picture, but a carved and coloured falcon, suspended in a hoop, whence the name of the sign.

The MAGPIE being a bird of good omen, was, on that account, very often chosen; with this another reason concurred, namely, the sign of the eatable pie falling into disuse, it was transformed into the Magpie, (see Cock and Pie;) and this transition was so much the easier as the original name of the magpie was pie, (Latin pica, French pie,) and only subsequently for its knowing antics, did it receive the nickname of maggoty † pie, which gradually was abbreviated into Magpie. The full form of the epithet is preserved in the nursery rhyme:—

"Round about, round about,
Maggoty Pie,
My father loves good ale
And so do I."

* Hone's Ancient Mysteries Described, p. 81.

† Magot is in French a quaint, little figure.

HEAD. The customers seeing the Old Gray Ass gone, thought the business had fallen into other hands, and so went to various inns in the neighbourhood, and particularly to a NEW GRAY Ass, which had just then opened in the same street. The landlord seeing his business falling off, through the change of his sign, yet unwilling to part with his Emperor's head, after long thinking and pondering, at last hit upon a clever compromise: he kept up the portrait of the Emperor, but wrote under it, "At the Original Gray Ass, (au véritable Ane Gris.)"

The PARROT, or POPINJAY, is an old sign now almost out of fashion, the GREEN PARROT, Swinegate, Leeds, being one of the few remaining. Andrew Maunsell, a bookseller and printer, resided at the Parrot in St Paul's Churchyard in 1570, and continued to trade under this sign till 1600. Taylor, the water poet, mentions the POPINJAY at Ewell, in 1636. It was a very appropriate sign for quacks, and one of these, at all events, had candour enough to adopt it. His handbill begins in a grandiloquent style:—"

"NOBLE or IGNOBLE, you may be foretold anything that may happen to your Elementary Life: as at what time you may expect prosperity; or if in Adversity the End thereof, or when you may be so happy as to enjoy the Thing desired. Also young Men may foresee their Fortunes as in a Glass, and pretty Maids their Husbands in this Noble, yea, Heavenlie art of Astrologie. At the sign of the Parrot opposite to Ludgate Church within Blackfriars' Gateway."*

The PARROT AND CAGE, in St Martin's Lane, Strand, advertised in 1711 as a "just and substantial office of insurance" on marriages, births, &c. This office, apparently, had chambers in some bird-fancier's house, at all events to that class of the community the sign belonged more exclusively. In 1787, there was one near the monument, the sign of a cagemaker who sold "like-wise parrots and other forring birds."

The PEACOCK, in ancient times, was possessed of a mystic character. The fabled incorruptibility of its flesh led to its typifying the Resurrection; and from this incorruptibility, doubtless, originated the first idea of swearing "by the Peacock," an oath that was to be inviolably kept. Its first introduction on the signboard is lost in the unrecorded wastes of time; but the oath was a common one in early times, especially on occasions of military adventures. Near the Angel in Clerkenwell, there is the PEACOCK public-house, which bears the date 1564. This was ably the most puzzling of all. It occurs on an old trades token of Cornhill, and is there called "THE LIVE VULTURE." That the man should have kept a live vulture at his door seems very improbable. The only explanation which occurs to us, is the possibility that, at some period or other, a live vulture had been exhibited at this house, and that from this event its name was derived.*

* Bagford Bills. Harl. MSS., 4631.

A curious instance of a tradesman exhibiting a living bird as an attraction to his house, is supplied us in a recent letter of a Paris correspondent, which gives at the same time an amusing anecdote of the well-known Alexandre Dumas. The writer, speaking of a magnificent new café which had recently been completed, says :—

"Writing of this newly started restaurant naturally recalls the fact of the disappearance of the historic pavilion of Henry IV. at St Germain-en-Laye, kept for many years by the Duchess of Berry's matre d'hôtel, Collinet. He was the pupil of Carême, and learnt to make sauces from Richout, saucemaker to the last of the Condés, and pastry from Heliot, "Ecuyer ordinaire de la bouche de Madame la Dauphine," a title I have vainly searched for in the list of the queen's household. The result of this combination of culinary instructions was that his "Bifteaks à la Bearnaise," and his woodcock pies, attracted not only all the fashionable world, but a brilliant galaxy of literary celebrities to the "Pavillon Henry IV." Alexandre Dumas's château of Monte Christo was close to St Germain. He sent daily for his cutlets to Collinet, who let his bill run on till it amounted to 25,000f. (£1000), in payment of which the distinguished chef received an autograph letter from the great novelist, accompanied by a live eagle. Alexandre Dumas expressed his regret at not being able to pay the bill, but suggested his exhibiting the eagle and the letter, which exhibition would inevitably attract crowds to his hotel, and there I myself have seen the eagle and read the letter."

* That vultures were exhibited as great curiosities, will be seen from our notice of the George and Vulture. See under RARE AND CURIOUS SIGNS.

once most mysteriously, not, however, without a rumour of her being under the protection of the Lord Chancellor, which, as she was a comely maiden with flaxen hair, "mulier superne et inferne," lies within the range of possibilities. The sea-serpent has now almost done away with the mermaid; yet, as late as 1857, there appeared an article in the Shipping Gazette, under the intelligence of 4th June, signed by some Scotch sailors, and describing an object seen off the North British coast, "in the shape of a woman, with full breast, dark complexion, comely face," and the rest.

At one time it appears to have been a very common sign, if we may judge from the way in which it is mentioned by Brathwait in his New Cast of Characters, (1631):—

"If she [the hostess] aspire to the conceit of a sine and device, her birch pole pull'd downe, he will supply her with one, which he performes so poorly as none that sees it, but would take it for a sign he was drunk when he made it. A long consultation is had before they can agree what sign must be reared. 'A meere-mayde,' says she, 'for she will sing catches to the youths of the parish.' 'A lyon,' says he, 'for that is the onely sign he can make; and this he formes so artlessly, as it requires his expression, this is a lyon. Which old Ellenor Rummung, his tapdame, denies, saying it should have been a meere-mayde."

Among the most celebrated of the Mermaid taverns in London, that in Bread Street stands foremost. As early as the fifteenth century, it was one of the haunts of the pleasure-seeking Sir John Howard, whose trusty steward records, anno 1464:—"Paid for wyn at the Mermayd in Bred Stret, for my mastyr and Syr Nicholas Latimer, x d. ob." In 1603, Sir Walter Raleigh established a literary club in this house, doubtless the first in England. Amongst its members were Shakespeare, Ben Jonson, Beaumont and Fletcher, Selden, Carew, Martin, Donne, Cotton, &c. It is frequently alluded to by Beaumont and Fletcher in their comedies, but best known is that quotation from a letter of Beaumont to Ben Jonson:—

"What things have we seen

Done at the Mermaid! heard words that have been
So nimble and so full of subtle flame,
As if that any one from whence they came
Had meant to put his whole wit in a jest,
And had resolved to live a fool the rest
Of his dull life; then when there hath been thrown Wit able enough to justify the town
For three days past; wit that might warrant be
For the whole city to talk foolishly,
Till that were cancell'd; and when that was gone,
We left an air behind us, which alone

Moser, in his "Vestiges Revived," mentions this same inn as the Dolphin, or rather, Dauphin Inn; and says that it was adorned with fleur-de-lys, cognisances, and dolphins; and was reported to have been the residence of one of the dauphins of France, probably Louis, the son of Philip August, who, in 1216, came to England to contest the sceptre with King John.* The house was still in existence at the end of the seventeenth century, when it was a famous coaching inn. Perhaps it was to this tavern that Pepys and his company adjourned on 27th March 1661:—

"To the Dolphin to a dinner of Mr Harris's, where Sir William and my Lady Batten and her two daughters, and other company, when a great deal of mirth, and there staid till 11 o'clock at night, and in our mirth I sang and sometimes fiddled, (there being a noise of fiddlers there,) and at last we fell to dancing, the first time that ever I did in my life, which I did wonder to see myself to do. At last we made Mingo, Sir W. Batten's black, and Jack, Sir W. Penn's, dance, and it was strange how the first did dance with a great deal of skill."

Pepys might well wonder what a man may come to, he who had been born when "lascivious dancing" was considered a heinous crime. Another Dolphin, well worthy of remembrance, was the sign of Sam. Buckley, a bookseller in Little Britain, at whose house Steele and Addison's Spectator was published.

Ancient naturalists made a wonderful animal of the dolphin. Bossewell, for instance, from whom we have just quoted, tells most extraordinary stories about him; but they are unfortunately too long to quote. Londoners formerly might have seen the living fish from the river banks, for old chroniclers every now and then have entries to the effect that dolphins paid London a visit. Thus: "3 Henry V. Seven dolphins came up the river Thames, whereof 4 were taken." "14 Rich. II. On Christmas day a dolphin was taken at London Bridge, being 10 ft. long, and a monstrous grown fish."† The DOLPHIN AND ANCHOR is still a common sign; and the FISH AND ANCHOR, at North Littleton, Warwickshire, evidently implies the same emblem. Aldus Manutius, the celebrated Venetian printer, was the first to use the sign, adopting it from a silver medal of the Emperor Titus, presented to him by Cardinal Bembo, with the motto, σευδὸς centuries. At the present day, 40s. would scarcely keep an Oxford or Cambridge student in cigar-lights.

* Moser makes a slight error. The heir-apparent to the throne of France did not assume the title of Dauphin till 1349, when Humbert II., Dauphin of Vienne, having no posterity, retired to a monastery, and sold his estates to Philip VI., King of France, on behalf of his grandson, afterwards Charles V.

† Delaune's "Present State of London."

"the best ink for deeds and records," 1677. Frequently the sign of the FISH is seen without any further specification ; in this case it is probably meant for the Dolphin, which is the signboard-fish par excellence. The Fish sign is a very common public house decoration at the present day, probably for the same reason as the Swan, because he is fond of liquor,—nay, to such an extent goes his reputation for intemperance, that to "drink like a fish" is a quality of no small excellence with publicans. In Carlisle, however, there are two signs of the FISH AND DOLPHIN, a rather puzzling combination,—unless it has reference to the dolphin's chase after the shoals of small fishes. The FISH AND BELL, Soho, may either allude to a well-known anecdote of a certain numskull, who, when he caught a fish, which he desired to keep for dinner on some future grand occasion, put it back into the river, with a bell round its neck, so that he should be able to know its whereabouts the moment he wanted it ; or it may be the usual Bell added in honour of the bell-ringers. A quaint variety of this sign is the BELL AND MACKEREL, in the Mile-End Road. The THREE FISHES was a favourite device in the Middle Ages, crossing or interpenetrating each other in such a manner, that the head of one fish was at the tail of another. We cannot prove that it had any emblematic meaning, but it may possibly represent the Trinity, the fish being a common symbol for Christ, derived from the Greek monogram or abbreviation, ΙΧΘΥΣ. It occurs as a sign in the following advertisement, which minutely describes the livery of a page in the year of the Restoration :—

"ON SATURDAY night last run away from the Lord Rich, Christophilus Cornaro, a Turk christened ; a French youth of 17 or 18 years of age, with flaxen hair, little blew eyes, a mark upon his lip, and another under his right eye ; of a fair complexion, one of his ears pierced, having a pearl-coloured suit, trimmed with scarlet and blue ribbons, a coat of the same colour with silver buttons ; his name Jacob David. Give notice to the Lord, lodging at the Three Fishes in New Street, in Covent Garden, a cook-shop, and good satisfaction shall be given." *

THE THREE HERRINGS, the sign of James Moxton, a bookseller in the Strand, near Yorkhouse, in 1675, is evidently but another name for the Three Fishes ; at the present day it is the sign of an ale-house in Bell Yard, Temple Bar. Several taverns with this sign are mentioned in the French tales and plays of the 17th century ; two of them seem to have been very celebrated, one in the Faubourg St Marceau, the other near the Palais de Justice ;

* "Mercurius Publicus," Aug. 30 ; Sep. 6, 1660.

Though the living bees were gone the following season, yet the sign and inscription remained until very recently. The following is a common inscription under the sign of the Beehive :—

“ Within this hive we're all alive,
Good liquor makes us funny;
If you are dry, step in and try
The flavour of our honey.”

A tea-dealer at the corner of Oxford Street, Tottenham Court Road, in the end of the last century, had for his sign the Walking Leaf, (the Phyllium siccifolium of the naturalists,) an East Indian insect, of an anything but agreeable association, when we consider the remarkable vegetable appearance of this insect, and the possibility that it might be dried among the tea-leaves.

Although the frog cannot be considered either an insect or a fish, yet we may include it in this chapter. Of frogs there are some instances on the signboard; the THREE FROGS, (see under Heraldic Signs,) and FROGHALL, formerly a public-house at the south end of Frog Lane, Islington. On the front of this house there was exhibited the ludicrous sign of a plough drawn by frogs. There is at the present day a Froghall Inn at Wolston, near Coventry; and a public-house of that name at Layerthorpe in the West Riding, but the picture of the sign was doubtless unique. The principal inn on the island of Texel is called the GOLDEN FROG, (de Goude kikker.) We may wonder that there are not more examples of this sign in Holland, for there are, without doubt, as many frogs in that country as there are Dutchmen; and even unto this day it is a mooted point, which of the two nations has more right to the possession of the country; both, however, are of a pacific disposition, so that they live on in a perfect entente cordiale.

"Another brought her bedes
Of jet or of coale,
To offer to the Alepole."

How these Alepoles, from the very earliest times, continued to enlarge and encroach upon the public way, has been shown in our Introduction, pp. 16, 17. The Bunch gradually became a garland of flowers of considerable proportions, whence Chaucer, describing the Sompnour, says:—

"A garlond hadde he sette upon his hede
As gret as it were for an alestake."

Afterwards it became a still more elegant object, as exemplified by the Nagshead in Cheapside, in the print of the entry of Marie de Medici; finally it appeared as a crown of green leaves, with a little Bacchus, bestriding a tun dangling from it. Thus the sign was used simultaneously with the bush.

"If these houses [ale-houses] have a boxe-bush, or an old post, it is enough to show their profession. But if they be graced with a signe compleat, it's a signe of a good custome." *

In a mask of 1633, the constituents of a tavern are thus described:—"A flaminge red lattice, seuerall drinking roomes, and a backe doore, but especially a conceited signe and an eminent bush." "Tavernes are quickly set up, it is but hanging out a bush at a nobleman's or an alderman's gate, and 'tis made instantly."—Shirley's Masque of the Triumph of Peace. In a woodcut from the "Cent Nouvelle Nouvelles," introduced in Wright's "Domestic Manners," the Bush is suspended from a square board, on which the sign was painted; for in France as well as in England, sign-board and bush went together:—

"La taverne levée
L'enseigne et le bouchon,
La dame bien peignée
Les cheveux en bouchon." †

—Chanson nouvelle des Tavernes et Tavernières, Fleur des Chansons Nouvelles, Lyon, 1586.

Whilst an English host in "Good News and Bad News," says:—"I rather will take down my bush and sign than live by means of riotous expence." Gradually, as signs became more costly, the bunch was entirely neglected and the sign alone remained.

* "The Country Carbonadoed," by D. Lupton, 1632. Vox "Alehouse."

†

"The tavern opened
With signboard and bush;
The landlady's hair neatly dressed,
Tied up in a knot."

meant, the payment will have been almost impossible in those days when ice-cellars were unknown.

At the present day some publicans take liberties with the old sign of the Rose ; in Macclesfield, and at Preston, for instance, there is the Moss Rose ; on Silkstone Common, in Yorkshire, the BUNCH OF ROSES ; on the London Road, Preston, the ROSEBUD, &c. The THREE ROSES was formerly a common sign ; from the way they are represented, they appear to have been heraldic roses, (see our illustration of the ancient Lattice.) It was the sign of Jonathan Edwin, bookseller in Ludgate Street in 1673. At the Rose GARLAND, Robert Coplande, the bookseller and printer, published in 1534 Dame Juliana Berner's "Boke of Hawkyng, Huntynge, and Fyshyng." This shop was in "the Flete Strete." Rose garlands or chaplets were not only worn in the middle ages as head-dresses, but also awarded as archery prizes.

"On euery syde a Rose garlonde
They shott under the lyne,
Whoso faileth of the Rose garlonde, sayth Robyn,
His tackyll he shall tyne."

Merry Gestes of Robin Hood.

Copland's Rose garland, doubtless, suggested the sign of another bookseller, John Wayland, who also lived in Fleet Street about the year 1540 ; his sign was the BLUE GARLAND.

The colloquial phrase, UNDER THE ROSE, is sometimes used as a sign, or written under the pictorial representation of the rose ; it occurs on a trade's token of Cambridge,* and may be seen on various public-houses of the present day. Numerous suppositions have been made concerning its origin, some holding that it arose from this flower being the emblem of Harpocrates ; others from a rose painted on the ceiling, any conversations held under which were not to be divulged ; whilst Gregory Nazianzen seems to imply that the rose, from its close bud, had been made the emblem of silence.

"Utque latet rosa verna suo putamine clausa,
Sic os vincla ferat, validis arcietur habenis,
Indicatque suis proluxa silentia labris."†

At Lullingstone Castle, in Kent, the residence of Sir Percival Dyke, Bart., there is, says a correspondent of Notes and Queries,

* See Boynes' Tokens issued in the seventeenth century in England, Wales, and Ireland.

† Like the rose in spring, hidden in its bud, so must the mouth be closed and restrained with strong reins, enforcing silence to the loquacious lips.

The like was never erst seen heere,
Such as this flower the Marygolde."

The flower was a favourite one in the middle ages, deriving the first part of its name from the Virgin Mary. No mention of the actual use of the sign, however, has been met with previous to 1638, when it appears on the title-pages of Francis Eglishield, a bookseller in St Paul's Churchyard. His name still occurs at the same house in 1673,* when it was also the sign of "Mr Cox, milliner, over against St Clement's Church in the Strand." † This must have been the same house in which Richard Blanchard and Francis Child, the goldsmiths, kept their "running cashes." ‡ It is the oldest banking firm in London. Francis Child, the founder, was, in the reign of Charles I., apprenticed to a goldsmith, William Wheeler, whose shop stood on the same spot now occupied by the bank. He married his master's daughter, and thus laid the foundation of his immense fortune. Many bills and other papers relating to Nell Gwynn are still preserved by this firm, as well as various documents concerning the sale of Dunkerque. Alderman Blackwell, who was ruined by the shutting up of the Exchequer in the reign of Charles II., was at one time a partner in this house. It was here that Dryden deposited the £50 offered for the discovery of the bullies of the "Rose-alley cudgel ambuscade." § The old sign of the house is still preserved by their successors, together with various relics of the Devil Tavern, on the site of which it was built.

Only a few other flowers occur, mostly modern introductions. The DAISEY, Bramley, Leeds; the TULIP, Springfield, Chelmsford; the LILIES OF THE VALLEY, Ible, near Wirksworth; the SNOWDROP, near Lewes; WOODBINE Tavern, South Shields; and the FOREST BLUE BELL, Mansfield. The Blue Bell is very common, but, inter doctores lis est, whether it signifies the little blue flower, or a bell painted blue.

As a sequel to the flowers, we may name the MYRTLE tree, of which there are two in Bristol, and the ROSEMARY BRANCH, in Camberwell, and in many other places. Rosemary was formerly an emblem of Remembrance, in the same way as the Forget-me-not is now; "There's Rosemary, that's for remembrance," says Ophelia, (Hamlet, ac. iv., s. 5,) and in Winter's Tale, Perdita says:—

* London Gazette, Nov. 6, 1673.

† Ibid., Oct. 20, 1673.

‡ See the "Little London Directory, 1677," recently reprinted.

§ Domestic Intelligence, Sept. 9, 1670.

the same county, may have been derived from some noted pear-tree in that neighbourhood, whose hollow and broken stem was secured with plates or bands of iron. Very general, also, is the CHERRY-TREE. It was the sign of a once famous resort in Bowling-green Lane, Clerkenwell, and was adopted on account of the quantities of cherry-trees which grew upon its grounds, even as late as thirty or forty years ago. In our younger days, this house was the resort of the fast men of Clerkenwell; its bowling-green gave the name to the alley in which the house stood. Down the river, at Rotherhithe, was the CHERRY-GARDEN, a famous place of entertainment in the reign of the Merry Monarch. Pepys went to it on June 15, 1664, and, with his usual pleasant fit of animal spirits, "came home by water, singing merrily."

"Over against the parish church, [St Olave's, Southwark,] on the side of the street, was some time one great house, builded of stone, with arched gates, which pertained to the Prior of Lewis, in Sussex, and was his lodging when he came to London; it is now a common hostelry for travellers, and hath to sign the WALNUT-TREE." *

The WALNUT-TREE was also the sign of a tavern at the south side of St Paul's Churchyard, over against the New Vault, in which place a concert is advertised in July 1718, which, from the high price of the admission tickets—5s. each—must have been something out of the common.† The Walnut-tree was frequently adopted by cabinetmakers, and is at the present day a not uncommon alehouse sign.

The MULBERRY-TREE was introduced at an early period, but does not seem to have been used as a sign until modern times. James I., in 1609, caused several shiploads of mulberry trees to be imported from abroad to encourage the home manufacture of silk: these were planted in a part of St James's Park; but the climate being too cold for the silk worms, it was changed into a pleasure garden, where even the serious Evelyn would occasionally relax. 10th May 1654:—

"My Lady Gerard treated us at the Mulberry Gardens, now ye only place of refreshment about y^e towne for persons of y^e best quality to be exceedingly cheated at; Cromwell and his partizans having shut up and seized on Spring Gardens, which till now had been y^e usual rendezvous for y^e ladyes and gallants at this season."

Here Dryden went to eat mulberry tarts, and here Pepys occasionally dined, as 5th April 1669, when he indulged in what he calls an "olio," evidently an olla podrida, since it was prepared as hors d'œuvres, for Randle Holme, in his instructions how to arrange a dinner, (in that omnium gatherum, "Academy of Armory,") mentions oranges and lemons as the first item of the second course. At all events, they were abundant enough in 1559, for on May day of that year the revellers "at the queen's plasse at Westminster shott and threw eges and orengs on a-gaynst a-nodur."* In an "Account of several Gardens near London," in 1691, † Beddington Gardens are mentioned—then in the hands of the Duke of Norfolk, but belonging to the Carew family—as having in it the best oranges in England. The orange and lemon trees grew in the ground, "and had done so near one hundred years, the house in which they were being above 200 feet long. Each of the trees was about 13 feet high, and generally full of fruit, producing above 10,000 oranges a year." Sir William Temple's oranges at Sheen are also praised. It is, indeed, a pity that this plant has so much gone out of fashion; for, besides being always green, it bears fruit and flowers all the year round, both appearing at the same time. The flowers have a delicious smell; the candied petals impart a very fine flavour to tea, if a few of them are infused with it; whilst the fruit may be preserved in exactly the same manner as other fruit. The sign of the orange-tree still occurs at Highgate, Birmingham; the LEMON TREE at Beacon Street, Lichfield.

* Stow's Survey, p. 340.

† Daily Courant, July 1, 1718.

The OLIVE TREE was a common Italian warehouse sign, but was occasionally used by other shops. Amongst the tokens in the Beaufof Collection, there is the "Olfa Tree, Singon Strete," an example of the liberties taken with our language on the old tokens, as this stands for the Olive Tree in St John's Street. The usefulness of the olive tree made it in very early times a symbol of peace. In 1503 it was the sign of Henry Estienne, a bookseller and printer at the end of the Rue de St Jean Beauvais, otherwise Clos Bruneau, in Paris. This firm, for several generations, continued the leading publishers and printers in Paris. Sauval, who wrote in 1650, says that in his time the olive tree, carved in stone, was still to be seen in the front of the house. Here Francis L, in 1539, visited Robert Estienne, grandson of the founder of the firm, in his workshops; and to give him a proof of his favour, conferred upon him the title of Printer to the King for Latin and Hebrew; and presented him with those beautiful letters which Estienne proudly mentions on his title-pages: "Ex officina Roberti Stephani, typographi regii, typis regis."

* Machyn's Diary.

† Archæologia, vol. xii.

The VINE, or the BUNCH OF GRAPES, is a very natural sign at a place where wine is sold. The last particularly was almost inseparable from every tavern, and was often combined with other objects—

"Without there hangs a noble sign,
Where golden grapes in image shine;
To crown the bush, a little Punch-
Gut Bacchus dangling of a bunch,
Sits loftily enthron'd upon
What's called (in miniature) a Tun."

Compleat Vintner: London, 1720, p. 86.

The BUNCH OF CARROTS, at Hampton Bishop, Hereford, is probably meant as a joke upon the Bunch of Grapes. Bagford, in a letter to his brother antiquary, Leland, * says :—

"I have often thought, and am now fully perswaded, that the planting of vines in the adjacent parts about this city, was first of all begun by the Romans, an industrious people, and famous for their skill in agriculture and gardening, as may appear from their rei agrarie scriptores, as well as from Pliny and other authors. We had a vineyard in East Smithfield, another in Hatton Garden, (which at this time is called Vine Street,) and a third in St Giles-in-the-Fields.† Many places in the country bear the name of the Vineyard to this day, especially in the ancient monasteries, as Canterbury, Ely, Abingdon, &c., which were left as such by the Romans."

In Bede's time vineyards were abundant; and still later, tithes on wine were common in Gloucester, Kent, Surrey, and the adjacent counties. Winchester was famous for its vineyards in olden times, for Robert of Gloucester, in summing up the various commodities of the English counties, says :—

"And London ships most, and wine at Winchester."

The Isle of Ely was called Isle des Vignes, and the tithe on the vines yielded as much as three or four tuns of wine to the bishop. Even in Richard II.'s time, the Little Park at Windsor was used as a vineyard for the home consumption; and the vale of Gloucester, according to William of Malmesbury, produced, in

* Prefixed to Collectanea, 1770, p. lxxv.; there is also a paper on Vines in England in Archæologia, i. p. 321; and Roach Smith's Collectanea Antiqua, vol. vi., p. 78, et seq may be consulted with advantage upon this subject.

† Curiously enough, until about 1830, a public-house, the sign of the Vine, in Dobie Street, St Giles, occupied the very site assigned to this vineyard in Domesday Book, A.D. 1079.

the twelfth century, as good a wine as many of the provinces of France; this county, in fact, produced the best wine:—

“There is no province in England hath so many or such good vineyards as this county, [Gloucester,] either for fertility or sweetness of the grape; the wine whereof carrieth no unpleasant tartness, being not much inferior to French in sweetness.” *

From the household expenses of Richard de Swinfield, Bishop of Hereford, (1289–1290,) it appears that the white wine was at that period chiefly home-grown, whilst the greater proportion of red wine was imported from abroad. Even as late as the last century wine was made in England: Faulkner† quotes the following memorandum from the MS. notes of Peter Collinson:—

“October 18, 1765.—I went to see Mr Roger’s vineyards at Parson’s Green [at Fulham] all of Burgundy grapes, and seemingly all perfectly ripe; I did not see a green, half-ripe grape in all this quantity. He does not expect to make less than fourteen hogsheads of wine. The branches and fruit are remarkably large, and the wine very strong.”

Grosley‡ mentions a vineyard at Cobham, belonging to a Mr Hamilton, of about half an acre, planted with Burgundian vines; but the wine it produced will cause nobody to regret that the culture has been abandoned, for “it was a liquor of a darkish gray color; to the palate it was like verjuice and vinegar blended together by a bad taste of the soil.” This description, enough to set the teeth on edge, is most likely true, and gives us the reason why English wine came to be abandoned.

As the vine was set up as a sign in honour of wine, so the HOP-POLE, or the HOP AND BARLEYCORN, the BARLEY MOW, the BARLEY STACK, the MALT AND HOPS, and the HOPBINE, are very general tributes of honour rendered to beer. In many ale-houses a bunch of hops may be seen suspended in some conspicuous place.

The PINE-APPLE, in the end of the last and the beginning of this century, was generally the emblem adopted by confectioners, though not exclusively, for it was the sign of an eating-house in New Street, Strand, at which Dr Johnson, on his first coming to town, used to dine.

“I dined very well for eightpence, with very good company, at the Pine-apple in New Street, just by. § Several of them had travelled; they expected

* Hollinshed’s Description of Britain, p. 2.

† Faulkner, Antiquities of Kensington.

‡ Grosley, vol. i., p. 83.

§ He lived then in Exeter Street, at a stay-maker’s. Boswell’s Johnson: London, 1819, p. 87.

to meet every day, but did not know one another's names. It used to cost the rest a shilling, for they drank wine; but I had a cut of meat for sixpence, and bread for a penny, and gave the waiter a penny; so that I was quite well served, nay, better than the rest, for they gave the waiter nothing."

The pine-apple was first known at the discovery of America, and was preserved in sugar as early as 1556. The first pine-apple was brought from Santa Cruz to the West Indies, thence to the East Indies and China. Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, writing in October 1716, informs her sister that she had been at a supper of the King of Hanover, "where there were," says she, "what I thought worth all the rest, two ripe ananas, which, to my taste, are a fruit perfectly delicious. You know they are naturally the growth of Brazil, and I could not imagine how they came there, but by enchantment." Upon inquiry she learned that they had been forced in stoves or hot-houses, and is "surprised we do not practise in England so useful an invention." It was not till the end of the last century that they were introduced into English gardens, having been brought over from hot-houses in Holland; and from that time seems to date their introduction on the signboard. It is still in general use with public-houses.

Of the FIG TREE there are several examples among the London trades tokens, some of them, no doubt, grocers' signs, but other trades may have adopted it, either in allusion to the text of every man "sitting under his own fig-tree," or because the fig-tree was a symbol of quiet unassuming industry; as such, at least, Camerarius represents it:—

"Verno tempore ficus arbor speciosis floribus aut fructuum præcocium abundantia minime sese ostendat, nullamque inanem hominibus de se spem injicit: in autumno autem fructus suaves. ac quidem in illis reconditos quasi flores quosdam proferre solet."*

The ALMOND TREE was the sign of John Webster in St Paul's Churchyard, in 1663; and the PEACH TREE occurs sometimes as an ale-house sign, as, for instance, in Nottingham. Neither of these signs, however, are of frequent occurrence.

Not only fruit-trees but various forest-trees are constantly met with on the signboard: thus the GREEN TREE, which is very common, originally had allusion to the foresters of the "merry greenwood," or was suggested by some large evergreen, or tree shelter-

* "In spring-time the fig-tree does not make any show of beautiful flowers or precocious fruit to deceive mankind with idle hope; but in autumn it generally produces exceedingly sweet fruit, with flowers as it were contained within them."—Joachimus Camerarius, "Symbolorum Centuria Quatuor," 1607, Centur. I., p. 18.

ing, or standing near the inn ; of this green tree the GREEN SEEDLING in Chester is evidently a sprout. Again, in Sheffield there are two signs of the BURNT TREE, which name possibly originated from some tree having been damaged in a fire, and becoming a well-known landmark. The OAK, the vigorous emblem of our mighty state, is deservedly much used for a sign ; sometimes it is called the BRITISH OAK. At Kilpeck, in Herefordshire, the following rhyme accompanies it :—

"I am an oak and not a yew,
So drink a cup with good John Pugh."

Druidical recollections are called up by the OAK AND IVY, at Bilston, Stafford ; HEARTS OF OAK is the material out of which, according to the song, our ships and seamen are constructed, and therefore well deserves the favourite place it occupies amongst the signboards of the present day ; whilst the ACORN, the fruit of the British oak, is nearly as common as the other oak signs.

Next to the oak the ELM seems to have had most followers. From the trades tokens it appears that the THREE ELMS was the sign of Edward Boswell in Chandos Street, in 1667 ; and also of Isaac Elliotson, St John Street, Clerkenwell. Besides these there was, about the same date, the ONE ELM, and the ELM. At present we have the NINE ELMS, and the QUEEN'S ELM, Brompton, which is mentioned under the name of the QUEEN'S TREE, in the parish books of 1586. This tree is said to derive its name from the fact of Queen Elizabeth, when on a visit to Lord Burleigh, being caught in a shower of rain, and taking shelter under the branches of an elm-tree, then growing on this spot. The SEVEN SISTERS, the sign of two public-houses in Tottenham, were seven elm-trees, planted in a circular form, with a walnut tree in the middle ; they were upwards of 500 years old, and the local tradition said that a martyr had been burnt on that spot. They stood formerly at the entrance from the high road at Page Green, Tottenham. Within the last twenty years they have been removed. The CHESTNUT, the SYCAMORE, the BEECH TREE, the FIR TREE, the BIRCH TREE, and the ASH TREE, all occur in various places where ale-houses are built in the shadow of such trees. The THORN TREE is peculiar to Derbyshire. The BUCKTHORN TREE was, in 1775, the sign of "William Blackwell in Covent Garden, or at his garden in South Lambeth." He had chosen this sign because he sold, amongst other herbs, "buckthorn and elder-berries, besides leeches and vipers." What the use of the first was is well known ; midst thereof ;" or else from a coincidence between the weeping willow and falling tears. Another reason has been assigned: the Agnus castus or vitex was supposed by the ancients to promote chastity, "and the willow being of a much like nature," says an old writer, "it is yet a custom that he which is deprived of his love must wear a willow garland."—Swan's Speculum Mundi, ch. vi. sec. 4. 1635.

The frequency of the sign of the YEW TREE is not to be attributed to its association with the churchyard, but to its being the wood from which those famous bows were made that did such execution at Agincourt and Poitiers, and wherever the English armies trod the field before the invention of gunpowder. So great was the patronage our early kings granted to the practice of the bow, that the patten-makers, by an Act of Parliament of 4 Henry V., were forbidden, under a penalty of £5, to use in their craft any kind of wood fit to make arrows of.

The COTTON TREE is a sign generally put up in the neighbourhood of cotton factories, as at Manchester. The PALM TREE is one of the oldest symbols known: it was used as such by the Assyrians, the Greeks, the Romans, and by them transmitted to the early Christians. St Ambrosius, in a very forcible image, compares the life of an early and faithful Christian to the palm tree, rough and rugged below, like its stem, but increasing in beauty upwards, where it bears heavenly fruit. It might also illustrate a more homely truth, namely, that business cannot flourish without patronage and custom; thus, Camerarius says:—

"Inter alias multas singulares proprietates quas scriptores rerum naturalium Palmæ attribuunt, ista non postrema est, quod hæc arbor non facile crescat, nisi radiis solaribus opt. foveatur nec non humore aliquo conveniente irrigetur."*

The COCOA TREE was frequently the sign of chocolate-houses when that beverage was newly imported and very fashionable. One of the most famous was in St James' Street; it was, in the reign of Queen Anne, strictly a Tory house:—"A Whig will no more go to the Cocoa Tree, or Ozinda's, [another chocolate-house in the same neighbourhood,] than a Tory will be seen at the coffee-house of St James'."† Deep play was the order of the day

* "Among the many curious properties which the writers on natural history attribute to the palm tree, it is not one of the least singular that this tree cannot well thrive unless it be properly basked by the beams of the sun, and watered by some neighbouring stream."

—J. Camerarius, "Centuria," i., 1697.

† Defoe's Journey through England, p. 168.

"COFFEE HOUSE" was then the popular tea and coffee-gardens of the district, and was visited by the foreigners of the neighbourhood, as well as the pleasure-seeking Cockney from the distant city. There were other public-houses and places of entertainment near at hand, but the specialty of this establishment was its coffee. As the traffic increased, it became a posting-house, uniting the business of an inn to the profits of a pleasure garden. Gradually the demand for coffee fell off, and that for malt and spirituous liquors increased. At present the gardens are all built over, and the old gateway forms part of the modern bar; but there are aged persons in the neighbourhood who remember Sunday-school excursions to the place, and pic-nic parties from the crowded city, making merry here in the grounds.

The HOLLY BUSH is a common public-house sign at the present day. Among the London trades tokens there is one of the HAND AND HOLLY BUSH at Templebar, evidently the same inn mentioned in 1708 by Hatton, "on the north side, and about the middle of the backside of St Clements, near the church."* This combination with the hand does not seem to have any very distinct meaning, and apparently arose simply from the manner of representing objects in those days, as being held by a hand issuing from a cloud. Adorning houses and churches at Christmas with evergreens and holly is a very ancient custom, supposed, like some others of our old customs, to be derived from the Druids. Formerly the streets also appear to have been decked out, for Stow tells us that "Against the feast of Christmas every man's house, as also the parish churches, were decked with holme, ivy, and bayes, and whatsoever the season of the year afforded to be given. The conduits and standards in the streets were likewise garnished."

Thus flowers, fruit trees, and forest trees were represented on the signboard, and with them even the homely but useful tenants of the kitchen garden found a place. The ARTICHOKE, above all, used to be a great favourite, and still gives a name to some public-houses. As a seedsman's sign it was common and rational; not so for a milliner, yet both among the Bagford and Banks's shopbills there are several instances of its being the sign of that business; thus :—

"Susannah Fordham, att the HARTICHOAKE, in ye Royal Exchange," in the reign of Queen Anne, sold "all sorts of fine poynts, laces, and linnens, and all sorts of gloves and ribons, and all other sorts of millenary wares."†

* Hatton's New View of London, 1708, p. 36.

† Bagford Bills.

Probably the novelty of the plant had more than anything else to do with this selection; for though it was introduced in this country in the reign of King Henry VIII., yet Evelyn observes:—

"'Tis not very long since this noble thistle came first into Italy, improved to this magnitude by culture, and so rare in England that they were commonly sold for a crowne a piece."*

The CABBAGE is an ale-house sign at Hunslet, Leeds, and at Liverpool, and CABBAGE HALL, opposite Chaney Lane, on the road to the Lunatic Asylum, Oxford, was formerly the name of a public-house kept by a tailor; but whether he himself had christened it thus, or his customers had a sly suspicion that it owed its origin to cabbaging, history has omitted to record. Another public-house, higher up the hill, was known by the name of CATERPILLAR HALL, a name clearly selected in compliment to Cabbage Hall, intimating that it meant to draw away the customers from Cabbage Hall, in other words, that the caterpillar would eat the cabbage. The OXNOBLE, a kind of potato, is the name of a public-house in Manchester, and the homely mess of PEASE AND BEANS was a sign in Norwich in 1750.† The THREE RADISHES was, in the seventeenth century, a common nursery and market gardener's sign in Holland. There was one near Haarlem, to which was added a representation of Christ appearing to Mary Magdalene in the garden, with this rhyme—

"Christus vertoont men hier
Na zyn dood in verryzen,
Alseen groot hovenier
Die ieder cen moet pryzen.
Dit 's in de drie Radyzen."‡

Another, near Gouda, had a still more absurd inscription:—

"Adam en Eva leefden in den Paradyze
Zelden aten zy stokvisch maar veel warmoes, kropsla en radyzen.
Hier vindt gy allerley aardgewas om menschen mée te spyzen."§

The WHEATSHEAF is an extremely common inn, public-house, and baker's sign; it is a charge in the arms of these three corpora-

* Evelyn's Miscellaneous Writings, p. 735.

† Gent. Mag., March 1842.

‡ "Christ is represented here
After his death and resurrection,
As a great gardener
Whom every body must praise.
This is at the Three Radishes."

§ "Adam and Eve lived in Paradise,
They rarely ate stock fish, but a great deal of hotchpotch, lettuce, and radishes.
All sorts of vegetables sold here for human food."

A similarly dull joke occurs in an old English comedy, "Law Tricks," by John Day, 1608. "I have heard old Adam was an honest man and a good gardener, loved lettuce well, salads and cabbage reasonably well, yet no tobacco."

tions, besides that of the brewers. In the middle of Farringdon Street, opposite the vegetable market, is Wheatsheaf Yard, once a famous waggon inn, which also did a roaring trade in wine, spirits, and Fleet Street marriages. Indeed, most of the large inns within the liberties of the Fleet served as "marriage shops" between 1734 and 1749 ; amongst the most famous were the BULL AND GAETER, the HOOP AND BUNCH OF GRAPES, the BISHOP BLAIZE AND TWO SAWYERS, the FIGHTING COCKS, and numerous others. The gateway entrance to the old coach-yard is adorned with very fine carvings of wheat ears and lions' heads intermixed, finished in a manner not unworthy of Grinling Gibbons himself.

The OATSHEAF is very rare ; it was the sign of a shop in Cree Church Lane, Leadenhall Street, in the seventeenth century, as appears from a trades token ; but this seems the only instance of the sign.

With these plants we may also class Tobacco, that best abused of all weeds. Sometimes we see a pictorial representation of the TOBACCO PLANT, but most usually it occurs in the form of TOBACCO ROLLS, representing coils of the so-called spun or twist tobacco, otherwise pigtail, for the sake of ornament, painted brown and gold alternately. Decker, in his "Gull's Hornbook," mentions Roll Trinidado, leaf, and pudding tobacco, which probably were the three sorts smokers at that day preferred. That it was used mixed may be conjectured from the introduction to "Cynthia's Revels," a play by Ben Jonson ; one of the interlocutors says,— "I have my three sorts of tobacco in my pocket."

CHAPTER VIII.

BIBLICAL AND RELIGIOUS SIGNS.

THE earlier signs were frequently representations of the most important article sold in the shops before which they hung. The stocking denoted the hosier, the gridiron the ironmonger, and so on. The early booksellers, whose trade lay chiefly in religious books, delighted in signs of saints, but at the Reformation the BIBLE amongst those classes, to whom till then it had been a sealed book, became in great request, and was sold in large numbers. Then the booksellers set it up for their sign; it became the popular symbol of the trade, and at the present moment instances of its use still linger with us. There was one day in the year, St Bartholomew's, the 24th of August, when their shops displayed nothing but Bibles and Prayer-books. It is not impossible that this may have been originally intended for a manifestation against Popery, since it was the anniversary of the dreadful Protestant massacre in Paris in 1572. The following, however, is the only allusion we have met with relating to this custom:—"Like a bookseller's shop on Bartholomew day at London, the stalls of which are so adorned with Bibles and Prayer-books, that almost nothing is left within but heathen knowledge."^{*}

One of the last BIBLE signs was about twenty years ago, at a public-house in Shire Lane, Temple Bar. It was an old established house of call for printers.

The Bible being such a common sign, booksellers had to "wear their rue with a difference," as Ophelia says, and adopt different colours, amongst which the BLUE BIBLE was one of the most common. "Prynne's Histrio-Matrix" was "printed for Michael Sparke, and sold at the Blue Bible, in Green Arbour Court, Little Old Bailey, 1632." This blue colour, so common on the sign-board, was not chosen without meaning, but on account of its symbolic virtue. Blue, from its permanency, being an emblem of truth, hence Lydgate, speaking of Delilah, Samson's mistress, in his translation from Boccaccio, (MS. Harl. 2251,) says—

" Insteade of blew, which steadfaste is and clene,
She weræd colours of many a diverse grene."

^{*} New Essays and Characters, by John Stephens the younger, of Lincoln's Inn, Gent. London, 1631, p. 221.

It also signified piety and sincerity. Randle Holme* says—

"This colour, blew, doth represent the sky on a clear, sun-shining day, when all clouds are exiled. Job, speaking to the busy searchers of God's mysteries, saith (Job xi. 17,) 'That then shall the residue of their lives be as clear as the noonday.' Which to the judgment of men (through the pureness of the air) is of azure colour or light blew, and signifieth piety and sincerity."

Other booksellers chose the THREE BIBLES, which was a very common sign of the trade on London Bridge in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries : of one of them, Charles Tyne, trades tokens are extant,—great curiosities to the numismatist, as booksellers were not in the habit of issuing them. The sign of the Three Bibles seems to have originated from the stationers' arms, which are arg. on a chevron between three bibles, or, a falcon volant between two roses, the Holy Ghost in chief. One bookseller, on account of his selling stationery, also added three inkbottles to the favourite three Bibles, as we see from an advertisement, giving the price of playing cards in 1711 :—

"SOLD by Henry Parson, Stationer at the THREE BIBLES AND THREE INKBOTTLES, near St Magnus' Church, on London Bridge, the best principal superfine Picket Cards, at 2s. 6d. a dozen; the best principal Ombro Cards, at 2s. 9d. a dozen; the best principal superfine Basset Cards, at 3s. 6d. a dozen; with all other Cards and Stationery Wares at Reasonable Rates." †

Combinations of the Bible with other objects were very common, some of them symbolic, as the BIBLE AND CROWN, which sign originated during the political troubles in the reign of Charles I. It was at this time when the clergy and the court party constantly tried to convince the people of the divine prerogative of the Crown, that the "Bible and Crown" became the standing toast of the Cavaliers and those opposed to the Parliament leaders. As a sign it has been used for a century and a half by the firm of Rivington the publishers. The old wood carving, painted and gilt in the style of the early signs, was taken down from over the shop in Paternoster Row in 1853, when this firm removed westward. It is still in their possession. Cobbett, the political agitator and publisher, in the beginning of this century chose the sign of the BIBLE, CROWN, AND CONSTITUTION; but the general tenor of his life was such, that his enemies said he put them up merely that he might afterwards be able to say he had pulled them down. A BIBLE, SCEPTRE, AND CROWN, carved in wood, may still be seen on the top of an ale-house of that name in High Holborn. The crown and sceptre in this case are placed on two closed Bibles.

* Randle Holme, "Academy of Armour and Blazon," p. 52.

† Postman, Feb. 1-3, 1711.

The BIBLE AND LAMB, i.e., the Holy Lamb, we find mentioned in an advertisement in the Publick Advertiser, March 1, 1759—

"TO BE HAD at the BIBLE AND LAMB, near Temple Bar, on the Strand Side, the Skin for Pains in the Limbs, Price 2s."

Books also were sold here, for in those days booksellers and toyshops were the usual repositories for quack medicines.

The BIBLE AND DOVE, i.e., the Holy Ghost, was the sign of John Penn, bookseller, over against St Bride's Church, Fleet Street, 1718; and the BIBLE AND PEACOCK, the sign of Benjamin Crayle, bookseller, at the west end of St Paul's, in 1688. If not a combination of two signs, the bird may have been added on account of its being the type of the Resurrection, in which quality it is found represented in the Catacombs, a symbolism arising from the supposed incorruptibility of its flesh.* Various other combinations occur, as the BIBLE AND KEY. Rowland Hall, a printer of the sixteenth century, had for his sign the HALF EAGLE AND KEY, (see Heraldic Signs,) of which the Bible and Key may be a free imitation. It was the sign of B. Dod, bookseller, in Ave Maria Lane, 1761; whilst the GOLDEN KEY AND BIBLE was that of L. Stoke, a bookseller at Charing Cross, 1711. The "Bible and Key" is also the name of a certain Coscinomanteia, somewhat similar to the Sortes Virgilianæ. This method of divination was performed in two ways, in the first, (stated by Matthew of Paris to have been frequently practised at the election of bishops,) the Bible was opened on the altar, and the prediction taken from the chapter which first caught the eye on opening the book; the other was by placing two written papers, one negative, the other affirmative, of the matter in question, under the pall of the altar, which, after solemn prayers, was believed would be decided by divine judgment. Gregory of Tours mentions another method by the Psalms.†

* "Notandum quoq. eius (pavonis) carnem quod D. Augustinus quoq., lib. xxi. de civitate Dei, cap. lli., et Isidorus, lib. xli., affirmant non putrescere."—Camerarius, Centur., lli. 20, 1697. How to make this agree with Skelton's idea it is not very easy to explain—

"Then sayd the Pecoocke,

All ye well wot,

I sing not musycal,

For my breast is decay'd."—Skelton's Armony of Birds.

† See Fosbrooke's Encyclopedia of Antiquities, vol. II., p. 673.

At the present day "Bible and Key" divinations are often attempted by those who believe in fortune-telling and vaticinations. The method adopted is as follows :—A key is placed, with the bow or handle sticking out, between the leaves of a Bible, on Ruth i. 16 :

"AND RUTH said, Intreat me not to leave thee, or to return from following after thee: for whither thou goest, I will go; and where thou lodgest, I will lodge; thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God."

The Bible is then firmly tied up, most effectually with a garter, and balanced by the bow of the key on the fore-fingers of the right hands of two persons, the one who wishes to consult the oracle, the other any person standing near. The book is then addressed with these words—"Pray, Mr Bible, be good enough to tell me if — or not?" If the question be answered in the affirmative the key will swing round, turn off the finger, and the Bible fall down; if in the negative, it will remain steady in its position. Not only upon matrimonial, but upon all sorts of questions, this oracle may be consulted.

Further combinations are the BIBLE AND SUN. The SUN was the sign of Wynkyn de Worde, and the printers that succeeded him in his house: It may, however, in this combination have been an emblem of the Sun of Truth, or the Light of the World. It was the sign of J. Newberry, in St Paul's Churchyard, the publisher of Goldsmith's "Vicar of Wakefield;" also of C. Bates, near Pie Corner; and of Richard Reynolds, in the Poultry, both ballad printers in the times of Charles II. and William III. Then there is the BIBLE AND BALL, a sign of a bookseller in Ave Maria Lane in 1761, who probably hung up a Globe to indicate the sale of globes and maps; and the BIBLE AND DIAL, over against St Dunstan's Church, Fleet Street, in 1720, was the sign of the notorious Edmund Curll, who was pilloried at Charing Cross, and pilloried in Pope's verses. The Dial was, in all likelihood, a sun-dial on the front wall of his house.

Of the Apocryphal Books there is only one example among the signboards, viz., BEL AND THE DRAGON, which was at one time not uncommon, more particularly with apothecaries. It was represented by a Bell and a Dragon, as appears from the Spectator, No. 28. "One Apocryphical Heathen God is also represented by this figure [of a Bell], which, in conjunction with the Dragon, makes a very handsome picture in several of our streets." Alwhen highwaymen, footpads, pickpockets, and low women, beginning to take a fancy to it, the magistrates interfered. The organ was banished, and the gardens were dug up for the foundation of Eden Street. In these gardens Lunardi came down after his unsuccessful balloon ascent from the Artillery ground, May 16, 1783. Hogarth has represented the Adam and Eve in the March of the Guards to Finchley. Upon the signboard of the house is inscribed, "Tottenham Court Nursery," in allusion to Broughton's Amphitheatre for Boxing, erected in this place. How amusing is this advertisement of the great Professor's "Nursery :"—

"From the Gymnasium at Tottenham Court on Thursday next at Twelve o'clock will begin :

A lecture on Manhood or Gymnastic Physiology, wherein the whole Theory and Practice of the Art of Boxing will be fully explained by various Operators on the animal Economy and the Principles of Championism, illustrated by proper Experiments on the Solids and Fluids of the Body; together with the True Method of investigating the Nature of all Blows, Stops, Cross Buttocks, etc., incident to Combatants. The whole leading to the most successful Method of beating a Man deaf, dumb, lame, and blind.

by THOMAS SMALLWOOD, A.M., Gymnasiast of St. Gilcs, and

THOMAS DIMMOCK, A.M.,
Athleta of Southwark,
(Both fellows of the Athletic Society.)

* * The Syllabus or Compendium for the use of students in Athletics, referring to Matters explained in this Lecture, may be had of Mr Professor Broughton at the Crown in Market Lane, where proper instructions in the Art and Practice of Boxing are delivered without Loss of Eye or Limb to the student."

The tree with the forbidden fruit, always represented in the sign of Adam and Eve, leads directly to the FLAMING SWORD, "which turned every way to keep the way of the tree of life." Being the first sword on record, it was not inappropriately a cutler's sign, and as such we find it in the Banks Collection, on the shop-bill of a sword cutler in Sweeting's Alley, Royal Exchange, 1780. It is less appropriate at the door of a public-house in Nottingham, for the landlord evidently cannot desire to keep anybody out, whether saint or sinner. The vessel by which the life of the first planter of the vine was preserved, certainly well deserves to decorate the tavern : hence NOAH'S ARK is not an uncommon public-house sign, though it looks very like a sarcastic reflection on the mixed crowd that resort to the house,—not to escape the "heavy wet," as the animals at the Deluge, but in order to obtain some of it. Toy-shops also constantly use it, since Noah's Ark is generally the favourite toy of children. Evelyn, in 1644, mentions a shop near the Palais de Justice in Paris :

"Here is a shop called Noah's Ark, where are sold all curiosities, natural or artificial, Indian or European, for luxury or use, as cabinets, shells, ivory, porcelain, dried fishes, insects, birds, pictures, and a thousand exotic extravagances."

The Deluge was one of the standard subjects of mediæval dramatic plays. In the third part of the Chester Whitsun plays, for instance, Noah and the Flood make a considerable item; and at a much later period the same subject was exhibited at Bartholomew Fair. A bill of the time of Queen Anne† informs us that—

"A T CRAWLEY'S BOOTH, over against the Crown Tavern in Smithfield, during the time of Bartholomew Fair, will be presented a little Opera, called the Old Creation of the World, yet newly revived, with the addition of Noah's Flood; also several fountains playing water during the time of the play. The last scene presents Noah and his family coming out of the Ark, with all the beasts, two by two, and all the fowls of the air, seen in a prospect, sitting upon trees. Likewise over the Ark is seen the sun rising in a most glorious manner: moreover, a multitude of angels will be seen, in a double rank, which presents a double prospect—one for the sun, the other for a palace, where will be seen 6 angels ringing of bells, etc."

The Deluge was the mystery performed at Whitsuntide by the company of dyers in London, and from this their sign of the DOVE AND RAINBOW might have originated, unless it were adopted by them on account of the various colours of the rainbow. On the bill of John Edwards, a silk-dyer in Aldersgate Street, the Dove, with an olive branch in her mouth, is represented flying underneath the Rainbow, over a landscape, with villages, fenced fields, and a gentleman in the costume of the reign of Charles II. Besides this there are various other dyers' bills with the sign of the DOVE AND RAINBOW, both among the Bagford and Banks Collections. A few public-houses at the present day still keep up the memory of the sign; there is one at Nottingham, and another in Leicester.

"ABRAHAM OFFERING HIS SON" was the sign of a shop in Norwich in 1750. A stone bas-relief of the same subject (Le Sacrifice d'Abraham) is still remaining in the front of a house in the Rue des Prêtres, Lille, France. A Dutch wood-merchant, in the seventeenth century, also put up this sign, and illustrated its application by the following rhyme :—

* Diary of John Evelyn, Feb. 3, 1684.

† Bagford Collection, Bib. Harl., 5931.

“T Hout is gehakt, opdat men 't zou branden, Daarom is dit in Abram's Offerhande.” *

Thus, though the wood of the sacrifice played a very insignificant part in the story, yet the simple mention of it was enough to make it a fit subject for a Dutchman's signboard. We have a similar instance in JACOB'S WELL, which is common in London, as well as in the country. The allusion here is to the well at which Christ met the woman of Samaria, who said to him :

“ART thou greater than our father Jacob, which gave us the well, and drank thereof himself, and his children, and his cattle? Jesus answered and said unto her, Whosoever drinketh of this water shall thirst again,” (S. John iv. 12.)

How cruelly these words apply to the gin-tap, at which generation after generation drink, and after which they always thirst again. Not unlikely the English use of this sign dates from the Puritan period.† Not always, however, had the sign any direct relation to the trade of the inmate of the house which it adorned ; as, for example, MOSES AND AARON, which occurs on a trades token of Whitechapel. In allusion to this, or a similar sign, Tom Brown says, “Other amusements presented themselves as thick as hops, as Moses pictured with horns, to keep Cheapside in countenance.”‡ Even the Dutch shopkeeper, whose imagination was generally so fertile in finding a religious subject appropriate as his trade sign, was at a loss what to do with Moses ; for a baker in Amsterdam, in the seventeenth century, put up the sign of Moses, with this inscription :

“Moses wierd gevist in het water,
Die hier waar haalt krygt vry gist, een Paaschbrood,
En op Korstyd een Deuvekater.” §

In London, however, the use of this sign may at first have been suggested by the statues of Moses and Aaron that used to stand above the balcony of the Old Guildhall. Connected with the history of Moses, we find several other signs, one in particular,

* “The wood is cut in order to be burned.
Therefore is this Abraham's sacrifice.”

† JACOB'S INN is mentioned by Hatton, 1708, “on the east side of Red Cross Street near the middle.”

‡ “Amusements for the Meridian of London,” 1706.

§ “Moses was found in the water.”

Whosoever purchases his bread here shall have yeast for nought,
Besides a currant-loaf at Easter, and a spice-cake at Christmas time.*

After Moses there is a blank until we come to SAMSON, to whom our national admiration for athletic sports and muscular strength has given a prominent place on the signboard. SAMSON AND THE LION occurs on the sign of various houses in London in the seventeenth century, as appears from the trades tokens. It is still of frequent occurrence in country towns, as at Dudley, Coventry, &c. It was also used on the Continent. In Paris there is, or was, not many years ago, a della Robbia ware medallion sign in the Rue des Dragons, with the legend "le Fort Samson," representing the strong man tearing open the lion. To a sign of SAMSON at Dordrecht, in the seventeenth century, the following satirical inscription had been added :—

"Toen Samson door zyn kracht de leeuw belemmen kon,
De Philistynen sloeg, de vossen overwon.
Wiert hy nog door een Vrouw van zyn gezigt beroofd, Gelooft geen vrouw dan of zy moet zyn zonder hoofd."*

This admiration of strong men, which procured the signboard honours to Samson, also made GOLIAH, or GOLIATH, a great favourite. In the Horse Market, Castle Barnard, he is actually treated just like a duke, admiral, or any other public-house hero, for there the sign is entitled the GOLIAH HEAD. Some doubts, however, may be entertained whether by Goliath or Goliah, (for the name is spelt both ways,) the Philistine giant and champion was always intended. Towards the end of the twelfth century there lived a man of wit, with the real or assumed name of Goliath, who wrote the "Apocalypsis Goliathæ," and other burlesque verses. He was the leader of a jovial sect called Goliardois, of which Chaucer's Miller was one. "He was a jangler and a goliardeis." Such a person might, therefore, have been a very appropriate tutelary deity for an alehouse.†

Goliah's conqueror, KING DAVID, liberally shared the honours with his victim, and he still figures on various signboards. There is a KING DAVID's inn in Bristol, and a DAVID AND

* "Though Samson by his strength could overcome the lion,
Defeat the Philistines and master the foxes,
Yet a woman deprived him of his sight;
Never, therefore, believe a woman unless she has no head."

This alludes to the GOOD WOMAN, described elsewhere in this work.
Samson's history was not only painted on the signboard, but also sung in ballads, "to the tune of the Spanish Pavin." Amongst the Roxburgh ballads (vol. i. fol. 366) there is one entitled "A most excellent and famous ditty of Sampson, judge of Israel, how hee wedded a Philistyne's daughter, who at length forsooke him; also how hee slew a lyon and propounded a riddle, and after how hee was falsely betrayed by Dalila, and of his death."

† See Bibliographia Britannica, voce Goliath, and Wright's History of Caricature.

HARP in Limehouse; whilst in Paris, the Rue de la Harpe is said to owe its name to a sign of King David playing on the harp. David's unfortunate son, ABSALOM, was a peruke-maker's very expressive emblem, both in France and in England, to show the utility of wigs. Thus a barber at a town in Northamptonshire used this inscription:

"ABSALOM, hadst thou worn a perriwig, thou hadst not been langed."

Which a brother peruke-maker versified, under a sign representing the death of Absalom, with David weeping. He wrote up thus:

"Oh Absalom! oh Absalom!
Oh Absalom! my son,
If thou hadst worn a perriwig,
Thou hadst not been undone."

Psalm xlii. seems to be very profanely hinted at in the sign of the WHITE HART AND FOUNTAIN, Royal Mint Street, which, if not a combination of two well-known signs, apparently alludes to the words, "As the hart panteth after the water brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God." The PANTING HART (het dorstige Hert, or het Heigent Hert,) was formerly a very common beer-house sign in Holland. In the seventeenth century there was one with the following inscription at Amsterdam:—

"Gelyk het hert by frisch water sig komt te bevryden, Komt also in myn huys om u van dorst te bevryden."*

Another one at Leyden had the following rhyme:—

"Gelyk een hart van jagen moe lust te drinken water rein, Alyso verkoopt men hier tot versterking van de maag, toebak, bier en Brandewyn."†

The wise king Solomon does not appear to have ever been honoured with a signboard portrait, but his enthusiastic admirer, the QUEEN OF SABA, figured before the tavern kept by Dick Tarlton the jester, in Gracechurch Street. This Queen of Saba, or Sheba, was a usual figure in pageants. There is a letter of Secretary Barlow, in "Nugæ Antiquæ," telling how the Queen of Sheba fell down and upset her casket in the lap of the King of Denmark—when on his drunken visit to James I.—who "got not

* "Like to the hart which comes to the water brook to refresh himself,
So you enter my house to quench your thirst."

† The first six words are literally the beginning of the psalm in the Dutch version,—

"Like a hart the hunt escaped, wishes for the limpid water brooks, So there is here tobacco, beer, and brandy for sale to strengthen the stomach."

a little defiled with the presents of the queen ; such as wine, cream, jelly, beverages, cakes, spices, and other good matters."

Douce, in his "Illustrations to Shakespeare," has a very ingenious explanation for the sign of the BELL SAVAGE, as derived from the QUEEN OF SABA, which though non è vero, ma ben trovato. He bases his argument on a poem of the fourteenth century, the "Romaunce of Kyng Alisaundre," wherein the Queen of Saba is thus mentioned :—

"In heore lond is a cité,
On of the noblest in Christianté,
Hit hotith Sabba in langage,
Thence cam Sibely Savage.
Of all the world the fairest queene,
To Jerusalem Salomon to seone.
For hire fair head and for hire love,
Salomon forsok his God above."*

ELISHA'S RAVEN, represented with a chop in his mouth, is the sign of a butcher in the Borough,—a curious conceit, and certainly his own invention ; at least we do not remember any other instance of the sign. This tribute is certainly very disinterested in the butcher, for if there were any such ravens now, it is probable that they would sadly interfere with the trade.

Few signs have undergone so many changes as the well-known SALUTATION. Originally it represented the angel saluting the Virgin Mary, in which shape it was still occasionally seen in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, as appears from the tavern token of Daniel Grey of Holborn. In the times of the Commonwealth, however, "sacrarum ut humanarum rerum, heu ! vicissitudo est," the Puritans changed it into the SOLDIER AND CITIZEN, and in such a garb it continued long after, with this modification, that it was represented by two citizens politely bowing to each other. The Salutation Tavern in Billingsgate shows it thus on its trades token, and so it was represented by the Salutation Tavern in Newgate Street, (an engraving of which sign may still be seen in the parlour of that old established house.) At present it is mostly rendered by two hands conjoined, as at the Salutation Hotel, Perth, where a label is added with the words, "You're welcome to the city." That Salutation Tavern in Billingsgate was a famous place in Ben Jonson's time ; it is named in "Bartholomew Fayre" as one of the houses where there had been "Great sale and utterance of wine,

Besides beere and ale, and ipocras fine."

* For the true origin of this sign, see under MISCELLANEOUS SIGNS.

If longer I'd sincerely thank'd you for it.
 Howe'r, receive my wishes, sons of verse!
 May every man who meets your praise rehearse!
 May mirth as plenty crown your cheerful board!
 And every one part happy, — as a lord!
 That when at home by such sweet verses fir'd,
 Your families may think you all inspir'd.
 So wishes he, who, pre-engag'd can't know
 The pleasures that would from your meeting flow."

In this tavern Coleridge the poet, in one of his melancholy moods, lived for some time in seclusion, until found out by Southey, and persuaded by him to return to his usual mode of life. Sir T. N. Talfourd, in his Life of Charles Lamb, informs us that here Coleridge was in the habit of meeting Lamb when in town on a visit from the University. Christ's Hospital, their old school, was within a few paces of the place:—

"When Coleridge quitted the University and came to town, full of mantling hopes and glorious schemes, Lamb became his admiring disciple. The scene of these happy meetings was a little public-house called the Salutation and Cat, in the neighbourhood of Smithfield, where they used to sup, and remain long after they had 'heard the chimes of midnight.' There they discoursed of Bowles, who was the god of Coleridge's poetical idolatry, and of Burns and Cowper, who of recent poets—in that season of comparative barrenness—had made the deepest impression on Lamb; there Coleridge talked of 'fate, free-will, foreknowledge absolute,' to one who desired 'to find no end' of the golden maze; and there he recited his early poems with that deep sweetness of intonation which sunk into the heart of his hearers. To these meetings Lamb was accustomed, at all periods of his life, to revert, as the season when his finer intellects were quickened into action. Shortly after they had terminated, with Coleridge's departure from London, he thus recalled them in a letter:—'When I read in your little volume your nineteenth effusion, or what you call "The Sigh," I think I hear you again. I imagine to myself the little smoky room at the Salutation and Cat, where we have sat together through the winter nights, beguiling the cares of life with poesy.' This was early in 1769, and in 1818, when dedicating his works—then first collected—to his earliest friend, he thus spoke of the same meetings:—'Some of the sonnets, which shall be carelessly turned over by the general reader, may happily awaken in you remembrances which I should be sorry should be ever totally extinct—the memory "of summer days and of delightful years," even so far back as those old suppers at our old inn—when life was fresh and topics exhaustless—and you first kindled in me, if not the power, yet the love of poetry, and beauty, and kindliness.'"

The ANGEL was derived from the Salutation, for that it originally represented the angel appearing to the Holy Virgin at the Salutation or Annunciation, is evident from the fact that, even as late as the seventeenth century on nearly all the trades tokens of houses with this sign, the Angel is represented with a scroll in his hands; and this scroll we know, from the evidence of paintings and prints, to contain the words addressed by the angel to the Holy Virgin: "Ave Maria, gratia plena, Dominus tecum." Probably at the Reformation it was considered too Catholic a sign, and so the Holy Virgin was left out, and the angel only retained. Among the famous houses with this sign, the well-known starting-place of the Islington omnibuses stands foremost. It is said to have been an established inn upwards of two hundred years. The old house was pulled down in 1819; till that time it had preserved all the features of a large country inn, a long front, overhanging tiled roof, with a square inn-yard having double galleries supported by columns and carved pilasters, with caryatides and other ornaments. It is more than probable that it had often been used as a place for dramatic entertainments at the period when inn-yards were customarily employed for such purposes. "Even so late as fifty years since it was customary for travellers approaching London, to remain all night at the Angel Inn, Islington, rather than venture after dark to prosecute their journey along ways which were almost equally dangerous from their bad state, and their being so greatly infested with thieves."* On the other hand, persons walking from the city to Islington in the evening, waited near the end of John Street, in what is now termed Northampton Street, (but was then a rural avenue planted with trees,) until a sufficient party had collected, who were then escorted by an armed patrol appointed for that purpose. Another old tavern with this sign is extant in London, behind St Clement's Church in the Strand. To this house Bishop Hooper was taken by the Guards, on his way to Gloucester, where he went to be burnt, in January 1555. The house, until lately, preserved much of its ancient aspect: it had a pointed gable, galleries, and a lattice in the passage. This inn is named in the following curious advertisement:—

"TO BE SOLD, a Black Girl, the property of J. B——, eleven years of age, who is extremely handy, works at her needle tolerably, and speaks French perfectly well; is of excellent temper and willing disposition. Inquire of W. Owen, at the Angel Inn, behind St Clement's Church, in the Strand."—Publick Advertiser, March 28, 1769.

Older than either of these is the Angel Inn, at Grantham. This building was formerly in the possession of the Knights

* Cromwell's History of Clerkenwell, p. 32.

Templars, and still retains many remains of its former beauty, particularly the gateway, with the heads of Edward III. and his queen Philippa of Hainault on either side of the arch; the soffits of the windows are elegantly groined, and the parapet of the front is very beautiful. Kings have been entertained in this house; but it seemed to bring ill luck to them, for the reigns of those that are recorded as having been guests in it, stand forth in history as disturbed by violent storms—King John held his court in it on February 23, 1213; King Richard III. on October 19, 1483; and King Charles I. visited it May 17, 1633.

Ben Jonson, it is said, used to visit a tavern with the sign of the Angel, at Basingstoke, kept by a Mrs Hope, whose daughter's name was Prudence. On one of his journeys, finding that the house had changed both sign and mistresses, Ben wrote the following smart but not very elegant epigram:—

“When Hope and Prudence kept this house, the Angel kept the door,
Now Hope is dead, the Angel fled, and Prudence turned a w——.”

The Angel was the sign of one of the first coffee-houses in England, for Anthony Wood tells us that, “in 1650 Jacob, a Jew, opened a coffee-house at the Angel, in the parish of St Peter, Oxon; and there it [coffee] was by some, who delight in noveltie, drank.” Finally, there was an Angel Tavern in Smithfield, where the famous Joe Miller, of joking fame—a comic actor by profession—used to play during Bartholomew Fair time. A playbill of 1722 informs the public in large letters that—“MILLER is not with PINKETHMAN, but by himself, at THE ANGEL TAVERN, next door to the King's Bench, who acts a new Droll, called the FAITHFUL COUPLE OR THE ROYAL SHEPHERDESS, with a very pleasant entertainment between OLD HOB and his WIFE, and the comical humours of MORSY and COLLIN, with a variety of singing and dancing.

The only Comedian now that dare,
Vie with the world and challenge the Fair.”

In France, also, the sign of the Angel is and was at all times, very common. The Hotel de l'Ange, Rue de la Huchette, appears to have been the best hotel in Paris in the sixteenth century. It was frequently visited by foreign ambassadors: those sent by Emperor Maximilian to Louis XII. took up their abode here; so did the ambassadors from Angus, King of Achaia, who, in 1552, came to see France, much in the same way as various ambassadors from all sorts of high and low latitudes occasionally honour our Court with a visit. Chapelle, a French poet of the signboard and in heraldry. That three angels were thought to possess mysterious power, is evident from the following Devonshire charm for a burn :—

“Three Angels came from the north, east, and west,
One brought fire, another ice,
And the third brought the Holy Ghost,
So out fire—and in frost—
In the name of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost.”

The THREE ANGELS was a very general linen-draper's sign, for which there seems no reason other than that the long flowing garments in which they are generally represented, suggest their having been good customers to the drapery business.

Angels appear in combination with various heterogenous objects, in many of which, however, the so-called Angel is simply a Cupid. The ANGEL AND BIBLE was a sign in the Poultry in 1680.* The ANGEL AND CROWN was a not uncommon tavern decoration. The following stanza from a pamphlet, entitled, “The Quack Vintners,” London, 1712, p. 18, shows the way in which this sign was represented :—

“May Harry's ANGEL be a sign he draws
Angelick nectar, that deserves applause,
Such that may make the city love the Throne,
And, like his Angel, still support the Crown.”

From this we learn it was a Cupid or Amorino supporting a crown; the sign of the house had doubtless originally been the Crown, and the Cupid, so common in the Renaissance style, had been added by way of ornament, but was mistaken by the public as a constituent of the sign. The verses probably applied to the Angel and Crown, a famous tavern in Broad Street, behind the Royal Exchange. There was another ANGEL AND CROWN in Islington, where convivial dinners were held in the olden time. It was a common practice in the last and preceding centuries for the natives of a county or parish to meet once a year and dine together. The ceremony often commenced by a sermon, preached by a native, after which the day was spent in pleasant conviviality, after-dinner speeches, and mutual congratulations. The custom now has almost died out; but this is one of the invitation tickets :

ST MARY, ISLINGTON.

SIR,

You are desirèd to meet many other NATIVES of this place on Tuesday y^e 11th day of April 1788 at Mrs Eliz. Grimstead's y^e ANGEL AND CROWN,

* London Gazette. Nov. 8 to 11, 1680.

gives notice to Benjamin Maynard, at the ANGEL AND STILL, at Deptford, shall have a Guinea Reward and reasonable charges."—Weekly Journal, October 18, 1718.

In this case the still was simply added to intimate the sale of spirituous liquors.

The ANGEL AND SUN, apparently a combination of two signs, is named as a shop or tavern near Strandbridge, in 1663,* and is still the name of a public-house in the Strand. The ANGEL AND WOOLPACK, at Bolton, is the same sign which, near London Bridge, is called the NAKED BOY AND WOOLPACK. A woolpack, with a negro seated on it, was at one time very common; for a change or distinction, this negro underwent the reputed impossible process of being washed white, and thus became a naked boy, which, in signboard phraseology, is equivalent to an angel.

The VIRGIN was unquestionably a very common sign before the Reformation, and it may be met with even at the present day, as, for instance, at Ebury Hill, Worcester, and in various other places. In France it was, and is still, much more common than in England, as might be expected. Tallemant des Réaux tells of a miraculous tavern sign of NOTRE DAME, on the bridge of that name, in Paris, which was observed by the faithful to cry and shed tears, probably on account of the bad company she had to harbour. It was taken down by order of the archbishop. At the end of the seventeenth century there was, in the Rue de la Seine, Paris, a quack doctor, who pretended to cure a great variety of complaints. He put up a holy Virgin for his sign, with the words, "REFUGIUM PECCATORUM," which is one of the usual epithets of the holy Virgin in the Roman Catholic Church service, very wittily, although profanely, applied in this instance. The sign of the Virgin was also called OUR LADY, as: "Newe Inne was a guest Inne, the sign whereof was the picture of our Lady, and thereupon it was also called Our Lady's Inne."† OUR LADY OF PITY was the sign of Johan Redman, a bookseller in Paternoster Row, in 1542. Johan Byddell, also a bookseller, had introduced this sign in the beginning of that century. This Byddell, or Bedel, (who lived in Fleet Street, next to Fleet Bridge,) had evidently borrowed it from a nearly similar figure in Corio's History of Milan, 1505. He afterwards lived at the SUN, in Fleet Street, the house formerly occupied by Wynkyn de Worde.

* Kingdom's Intelligencer, April 6-13, 1663.

† Stow's Survey of London.

wards the Black Fryers, were drowned at S. Mary Loch * and the whirry-man saved by their oars."

To this same saint also refers the JOHN OF JERUSALEM, a sign at the present day in Rosoman Street, Clerkenwell, put up, like the Baptist Head, in remembrance of the Knights of St John of Jerusalem, who formerly had their priory in this locality.

In France this sign was equally common. Jean Carcain, one of the early Parisian publishers and printers, (1487,) adopted it for his shop. One of his books has the following quaint impress :—

"Parisii Sancti Pons est Michaelis in Urbe;
Multæ illic aedes; notior una tamen;
Hanc cano, quæ Sacri Baptistæ fronte notata est
Hic respondebit Bibliopola tibi;
Vis impressoris nomen quoque nosse? Joannis
Carcain nomen ei est. Ne pete plura, Vale."†

It was an old signboard jocularity in France to represent St John the Baptist by a monkey with cambric (batiste) ruffles and wristbands, (singe en batiste.) From the parables the sign of the GOOD SAMARITAN was borrowed, which, even at the present day, may be seen in Turner Street, Whitechapel; Grimshaw Park, Blackburn, &c. When barbers combined with their trade the practice of letting blood—otherwise than by "easy shaving,"—of drawing teeth, and setting bones, they frequently adopted this sign. In the seventeenth century, a barber-surgeon at Leeuwarden, in Holland, wrote under his device of the Good Samaritan the following poetical effusion :—

"Gelyk den Wyn, fyn,
Dryft zorgen uit der herten
Zoo geneest Medicyn, pyn,
En ontlast van Smarten."‡

The SAMARITAN WOMAN (la Samaritaine) is the French version of our JACOB'S WELL, and was a common sign in Paris; everybody knows the Bains de la Samaritaine, in which the luxurious Parisian indulges in a fresh water bath in his Seine, which at that place is about as clear as the Thames at Blackwall. In the Rue

* Name of one of the arches of old London Bridge.

† "In the town of Paris there is a bridge named St Michael, On which there are many houses; but one of them is more known than the others. That is the house I mean, which is known by the sign of the Baptist Head. There the bookseller will answer you. Would you also like to know the name of the printer? John Carcain is his name. Now, do not ask any more. Farewell"

‡ "Like wine, fine,
Driveth away care;
So medicine cureth pain,
And delivers us from suffering."

words, and restored those to their senses whom these evil spirits had possessed ; so now His followers in the name of their Master, and by the sign of His passion, even exercise the same dominion over them." St Ephrem says—" Let us paint and imprint on our doors the life-giving cross ; thus defended no evil will hurt you." St Chrysostom says the same—" Wherefore let us with earnestness impress this cross on our houses, and on our walls, and our windows." St Cyril of Alexandria introduces the Emperor Julian the apostate saying, " You Christians adore the wood of the cross, you engrave it on the porches of your houses," &c. Hence the still prevalent custom in Roman Catholic places of painting crosses on the walls of houses, to drive away witches, as it is said ; and these crosses being painted in different colours, might easily serve as a sign by which to designate the house. At the Crusades the popularity of this emblem increased : a red cross was the badge of the Crusader, and would be put up as a sign by men who had been to the Holy Land, or wished to court the patronage of those on their way thither. Finally, the different orders of knighthood settled each upon a particular colour as their distinctive mark. Thus the knights of St John wore white crosses, the Templars red crosses, the knights of St Lazarus green crosses, the Teutonic knights black crosses, embroidered with gold, &c. But the most common in England was the red cross, which was the cross of St George, and also of the red cross knights, who acted as a sort of police on the roads between Europe and the Holy Land to protect pilgrims. This badge, therefore, could not fail to be very popular.

In France it used to be, and in all probability is still, a common rebus to see le signe de la croix represented by a swan with a cross on his back, (cygne de la croix.)

Only very few signs of the cross are now remaining. The GOLDEN CROSS in the Strand is one of these, and has been in that locality for centuries. It was one of the first upon which the Puritans brooked their ill-humour and hatred of popery ; for in 1643 it was taken down by order of a committee from the House of Commons, as "superstitious and idolatrous." This was the precursor of the fall of old Charing Cross itself. The sign, however, was put up again at the Restoration, and figures prominently in Canaletti's well-known view of Charing Cross, in the Northumberland Collection. The tavern was probably pulled down at the formation of Trafalgar Square.

that country, and were tolerably acquainted with Valladolid, his native town, worldly recollections began to overcome the sanctity of the good monk, and he became inexhaustible in reminiscences of his younger days. Whilst talking with him, and refreshing ourselves with a meal of salad, grown in the garden of Gethsemane, we had indulged in two tumblers of a pithy white wine, quite strong enough to justify our resisting the pressing invitations of the reverend butler to take a third glass; but the jovial monk was not to be beaten, and finally convinced us with the following argument: "Oh come, brother, you must take another glass, remember you are in Jerusalem, and so take one for the Father, one for the Son, and one for the Holy Ghost!"

Although the English ale and refreshment houses continue to select fresh signs from the notabilities of the hour, the Palmerston's Head and the Gladstone Arms for instance, they rarely choose anything of a religious or devotional cast. One instance, however, occurs to us, and that in the neighbourhood of London, which deserves mention. In Kentish Town, under the Hampstead hills, the noisiest and most objectionable public-house in the district bears the significant sign of the GOSPEL OAK. It is the favourite resort of navvies and quarrelsome shoemakers, and took its name, not from any inclination to piety on the part of the landlord, but from an old oak tree in the neighbourhood, near the boundary line of Hampstead and St Pancras parishes, a relic of the once general custom of reading a portion of the gospel under certain trees in the parish perambulations, equivalent to "beating the bounds." "The boundaries and township of the parish of Wolverhampton are," says Shaw, in his "History of Staffordshire," (vol. ii, p. 165,) "in many points marked out by what are called Gospel Trees;" and Herrick, in his "Hesperides," (Ed. 1859, p. 26,) says:—

"Dearest, bury me
Under that holy oak, or gospel tree;
Where, though thou see'st not, thou may'st think upon Me, when thou yearly go'st procession."

The old Kentish Town Gospel Oak was removed a short time since, but not until it had given a name to the surrounding fields, to a village, (Oak village,) and to a chapel, as well as to the public-house alluded to.

A curious French sign is mentioned by Coryatt, which he saw at Amiens. "I lay at the signe of the AVE MARIA, where I read these two verses, written in golden letters upon the linterne of the doore, at the entry into the Inne. This in Greeke, Τῆς φιλοξενίας μὴ ἐπιλανθάνεσθαι, that is, Forget not your good entertainment; and this in Latine, HOSPITIBUS HIC TUTA FIDES."*

Saints were formerly very common on signboards, and this abuse also was wittily ridiculed by the pungent satire of Artus Desiré, a French poet of the fifteenth century:—

"En leur logis plein de vers et de teignes,
Où est logé le grand diable d'enfer,
Mettent de Dieu et de saints les enseignes,
Leurs ditz logis où n'y a que desroys,
Pendre font tous sur le pavé du roy
De grands tableaux et enseignes dorées,
Pour des montres qu'ils ont fort bien de quoy,
Et qu'il y a de tres grasses porées.
L'un pour enseigne aura la Trinité,
L'autre Saint Jehan, et l'autre Saint Savin, L'autre Saint Maure, l'autre l'Humanité
De Jesus Christ notre Sauveur divin,
De Dieu, des saintz, sont leurs crieurs de vin,†
Tant aux citez que villes et villages,
Des susditz saintz les devotes images,
En prophanant leur préciosité."‡

* Coryatt's Crudities, London, 1776, p. 15, reprinted from the edition of 1611.

† In those early days the sign alone of a house was not thought to give sufficient publicity. Touters (crieurs) were therefore sent about town (a custom dating from the Romans.) Thus in the "Crieries de Paris," (Barbazan, Fabliaux et Contes, vol. ii., p. 277.)—

"D'autres cris on fait plusieurs,
Qui long seraient à reciter.
L'on crie vin nouveau et vieux,
Duquel l'on donne à tater."

These touters had their statutes and privileges granted to them by Philip Auguste in 1258, some of which are very curious.

‡ Not only had the innkeepers saints on their signboards, but the different reception-rooms in their houses were also sanctified with some holy name. Artus Desiré quaintly inveighs against this practice in his "Loyauté Conscienceuse des Tavernières:"—

"Semblablement toutes leurs chambres painctes,
Où il n'y a qu'ordure et ivrognise,
Portent les noms de benoïstz saintz et saintes
Contre l'honneur de Dieu et son Eglise.
L'une s'appelle, à leur mode et devise,
Le Paradis et l'autre Saint Clement.
Et quant quelqu'un rabaste fermement,
L'hostesse crie André, Guillot, Mornable,
Laisse-moy tout, et va legerement
En Paradis, compter de par le Diable.
S'on si veut chauffer,
Portent le fagot
Robin avec Margot,
De par Lucifer."

("In the same manner all their painted rooms, in which there is nothing but filth and

"Hier in Krispyn kan min de minsch int beeste villen
 Elk schoenen na zyn voet voor gilt terstond bestillen,
 Doch menig beest alheir steekt in een menschevel,
 Draagt zeep zyn broeder's huid en 't staat dat beest nog wel."*

The St HUGH'S BONES was another sign of the gentle craft; it seems to be extinct now, but a trades token shows that, in 1657, it was the sign of a house in Stanhope Street, Claremarket From a little chapbook, entitled,—

"The Delightful, Princely, and Entertaining History of the Gentle Craft, &c. London printed for J. Rhodes, at the corner of Bride Lane, in Fleet Street, 1725," we gather that Saint Hugh was a prince's son,† deeply in love with a saintly coquette called Winifred. Having been jilted by this lady in a very pious manner, he went travelling, resisted the temptations of Venice,‡ like another St Anthony, passed through numberless adventures, compared to which those of Baron Munchausen sink into insignificance, and was finally, by a jumble of most amusing anachronism, martyred in the reign of Diocletian, by being made to drink a cup of the blood of his lady-love, mixed with "cold poison," after which, his body was hung on the gallows. But among other misfortunes in his travels, he had been shipwrecked and lost all his wealth, so that he had to choose a profession, which was that of shoemaker, and so well he liked his fellow-workmen that, having nothing else to give, he bequeathed his bones to them. After they had been "well picked by the birds," some shoemakers took them from the gallows, and made them into tools, and hence their tools were named St Hugh's Bones. They are specified in the following rhyme, which appears to have been the shoemakers' shibboleth:—

"My friends, I pray, you listen to me,
 And mark what Saint Hugh's Bones shall be :
 First a Drawer and a Dresser,
 Two Wedges, a more and a lesser.
 A pretty Block, Three Inches high,
 In fashion squared like a die;
 Which shall be called by proper name
 A Heelblock, ah! the very same;
 A Handleather and a Thumbleather likewise,
 To put on Shooe-thread we must devise;

- * "Here at the Crispin any man may for his money
 Immediately obtain shoes made out of animals' skins;
 But many a brute in this town wears a human skin,
 Nay, wears his own brother's skin, and the brute looks even well in it."

† So were Crispin and Crispian, and hence the trade is called the "Gentle Craft."

‡ The gayest city in Europe three centuries ago.

"Therefore yet to this day, thei that over lond wende,
They biddeth Seint Julian, anon, that gode herborw he hem sende,
And Seint Julianes Pater Noster ofte seggeth also
For his faders soule and his moderes that he hem bring therto."

And in "Le dit des Heureux," an old French fabliau :—

"Tu as dit la patenotre
Saint Julian à cest matin,
Soit en Roumans, soit en Latin,
Or tu seras bien ostilé." *

In mediæval French, L'hotel Saint Julien was synonymous with good cheer.

"Sommes tuit vostre.
Par Saint Pierre le bon Apostre, L'ostel aurez Saint Julien," † says Mabile to her feigned uncle, in the fabliau of "Boivin de Provens;" and a similar idea appears in "Cocke Lorell's bote," where the crew, after the entertainment with the "relygyous women" from the Stews' Bank, at Colman's Hatch,

"Blessyd theyr shyppe when they had done
And dranke about a Saint Julyan's torne."

ST MARTIN's character as a saint was not unlike St Julian's; hence we find him frequently on the signboard. The most favourite representation being the saint on horseback cutting off with his sword a piece of his cloak, in order to clothe a naked beggar. Not only inns, but booksellers also used his sign, as for instance Dionis Rose, (1514,) printer in the Rue St Jacques, Paris; and Bernard Aubrey, another printer in the same street.

"Avoir l'hotel St Martin," in old French, meant exactly the same as "avoir l'hotel St Julian:" thus, in the romance of Florus and Blanche :—

"Flor. Sovent dient par le bon vin Qu'ils ont l'ostel Saint Martin." ‡

And in the story of "L'Anneau," by Jean de Boves, (which is the same as Chaucer's "Miller's Tale";) it is said of the two students at the end :—"C'est ainsi qu'ils eurent à ses depens l'ostel Saint

* "You have said
St Julian's prayer this morning,
Either in French or in Latin,
Now you are sure to be well lodged."

† "We are entirely at your service.
By S. Peter the good apostle
You shall have St Julian inn (or welcome)."

‡ "Often good wine makes them say,
That they have the inn of St Martin."

"Maister Hobson and another of his neighboris on a time walking to Southwarke faire, by chance dranke in a house, which had the signe of Sa. Christopher, of the which signe the goodman of the house gave this commendation, Saint Christopher (quoth he) when hee lived upon the earth bore the greatest burden that ever was, which was this, he bore Christ over a river; nay, there was one (quoth Maister Hobson) that bore a greater burden. Who was that? (quoth the innkeeper) Marry, (quoth Maister Hobson) the asse that bore him and his mother. So was the innekeeper called asse by craft."

The house in which this joke was perpetrated is enumerated by Stowe amongst the principal inns of Southwark.

ST LUKE still figures as the sign of two or three public-houses in London. Being the patron of painters, it certainly was the least the sign-painters could do to honour his portrait with an occasional appearance on the signboard. Yet it must be confessed St Luke was but a sorry hand at painting. There is a portrait of the Holy Virgin painted by him preserved in the Church of Silivria, on the shores of the Sea of Marmora; but such a daub! the most modest village sign-painter would be ashamed of the production. Yet, for all that, the thing works miracles, and the only wonder is that its first effort in this line was not to change itself into a good picture. We wonder at the Virgin, too, and expected better from her taste; for in Valencia Cathedral there is another portrait of her painted by Alonzo Cano, which is one of the most lovely female heads we ever had the happiness to gaze upon. And so well pleased was the Holy Virgin with this likeness, that she deigned to descend from heaven to compliment the blessed artist upon his work. So says the legend, and so the old beadle tells the travellers. But Luke possessed other attributes. Aubrey tells us: "At Stoke Verdon, in the Parish of Broad Chalke, was a chapell (in the chapell close by the farmhouse) dedicated to Saint Luke, who is the Patron or Tutelar Saint of the Horne Beasts, and those that have to do with them," &c.* This arose evidently from the Ox being his emblem, as the Lion was of St Mark, the Eagle of St John, and the Angel of St Matthew. For this reason St Luke was doubtless often chosen as the sign of inns frequented by farmers and graziers.

SIMON THE TANNER OF JOPPA is an old-established house in Long-lane, Bermondsey, and, as a sign, is supposed to be unique. It seems to have been adopted with reference to the tanners, who frequented the house, or it may have been the former occupation an inn of this name, mentioned in 1554 as being situate on the north side of the TABARD. This inn was very much damaged by the great fire of Southwark in 1670, and completely burned down in 1676. But it was rebuilt, and has come down to our time.

* Aubrey, Remains of Judaism and Gentilism. Lansdowne MSS., No. 231.

Machyn, in his Diary, mentions several Georges; one of them in connexion with an occurrence which gives a good view of these lawless times:—

“The viij day of December 1559 was the day of the Conception of owre Lade was a grett fyre in the Gorge in Bred stret; itt begane at vj of the cloke at nyght and dyd gret harm to dyvers houses. The 9th of December cam aerten fellows unto the Gorge in Bred stret where the fyre was and gutt into the howse and brake up a chest of a clotheare, and toke owt xl. lb. and after cryd fyre, fyre, so that ther cam ijc pepull, and so they took one.”

The George in Lombard Street was a very old house, once the town mansion of the Earl Ferrers, in which one of that family was murdered as early as 1175, (see Stow.) At this house died, in 1524, Richard Earl of Kent, who had wasted his property in gaming and extravagance; it was then an inn, where the nobility used to put up at. George Dowdall, Archbishop of Armagh, (1558,) was buried from this house. Finally, we may mention a George Inn at Derby, in connexion with the following advertisement from the Daily Advertiser, Oct. 1758:—

“A YOUNG LADY STRAYED.—A young Lady, just come out of Derbyshire, strayed from her Guardian. She is remarkably genteel and handsome. She has been brought up by a farmer near Derby, and knows no other but that they are her parents; but it is not so, for she is a lady by birth, though of but little learning. She has no clothes with her, but a riding habit she used to go to market in. She will have a fine estate, as she is an heiress, but knows not her birth, as her parents died when she was a child, and I had the care of her, so she knows not but that I am her mother. She has a brown silk gown that she borrowed of her maid—that is, dy'd silk, and her riding dress a light drab, lin'd with blue Tammy, and it has blue loops at the button-holes; she has outgrown it; and I am sure that she is in great distress both for money and cloaths; but whoever has relieved her I will be answerable if they will give me a letter, where she may be found; she knows not her own surname. I understand she has been in Northampton for some time; she has a cut in her forehead. Whosoever will give an account where she is to be found shall receive twenty guineas reward. Direct for M. W. at the George Inn, Derby.”

Besides the Dragon, St George is found in various other combinations, as the GEORGE AND BLUE BOAR, High Holborn, an old inn lately come to its end. In the seventeenth century this house was called the BLUE BOAR, and is said to have been the house in which Cromwell and Ireton, disguised as common PLATE XII.

GRINDING OLD INTO YOUNG.
(From an old woodcut, circa 1720.)

FIVE ALLS.

(From an old print by Kay. The figures represent Dr Hunter, a famous Scotch clergyman; Erskine the lawyer; a farmer; His Sacred Majesty George III.; and the gentleman whose name should never be mentioned to ears polite.)

demolition of the building it was put up at the back of a house in Hale Lane. After the fashion of the time, the house was duly puffed up in newspaper poems. The following is copied from a newspaper-cutting circa 1761-62, and as it enumerates the attractions of a suburban tea-garden of the period, may be quoted here at full length :—

“ If lur’d to roam in Summer Hours,
Your Thoughts incline tow’rd Tott’nham Bow’ra. *
Here end your airing Tour and rest
Where Cole invites each friendly Guest:
Intent on signs, the prying Eye,
The GEORGE AND VULTURE will descry;
Here the kind Landlord glad attends
To wellcome all his chearfull Friends
Who, leaving City smoke, delight
To range where various scenes invite.
The spacious garden, verdant Field,
Pleasures beyond Expression yield,
The Angler here to sport inclined
In his Canal may Pastime find.
Neat racy Wine and Home-brew’d Ale
The nicest Palates may regale,
Nectarious Punch—and (cleanly grac’d)
A Larder stor’d for ev’ry Taste.
The cautious Fair may sip with Glee
The fresh’st Coffee, finest Tea.
Let none the outward Vulture fear,
No Vulture host inhabits here,
If too well us’d you deem ye—then Take your Revenge and come again.”

St Paul, the patron saint of London, was formerly a common sign in the metropolis. One of the trades tokens of a house or tavern in Petty France, Westminster, represents the saint before his conversion, lying on the ground, with his horse standing by him; this house was called “the SAUL.” Perhaps this was a monkish pleasantry of the period, (as Westminster was under the patronage of St Peter,) representing an unpleasant event in the history of the great patron, and showing, by simple analogy, the vast superiority of the converted St Peter. The usual way, however, of commemorating the saint on the signboard was the St PAUL’S HEAD. This was the sign of a very old inn in Great Carter Lane, (Doctors’ Commons,) opposite which Bagford lived in 1712. As an inn, it is mentioned by Machyn, in his Diary, in 1562. “The 25 may was a yonge man did hang ymseylff at the

* Tottenham High Cross.

Temple Bar. The legend runs, that one day, when working at his trade of a goldsmith, he was sorely tempted by the devil, and at length got so exasperated that he took the red hot tongs out of the fire and caught his infernal majesty by the nose. The identical pinchers with which this feat was performed are still preserved at Mayfield Palace, in Sussex. They are of a very respectable size, and formidable enough to frighten the arch one himself. This episode in the saint's life was represented on the signboard of that glorious old tavern. By way of abbreviation, this house was called THE DEVIL, though the landlord seems to have preferred the other saint's name; for on his token we read: "The D—— (sic) and Dunstan," probably fearing, with a classic dread, the ill omen of that awful name.

Allusions to this tavern are innumerable in the dramatists; one of the earliest is in 1563, in the play of "Jack Jugeler." William Rowley thus mentions it in his comedy of a "Match by Midnight," 1633:—

"Bloodhound. As you come by Temple Bar make a step to the Devil.

Tim. To the Devil, father?

Sim. My master means the sign of the Devil, and he cannot hurt you, fool; there's a saint holds him by the nose.

Tim. Sniggers, what does the devil and a saint both on a sign?

Sim. What a question is that? What does my master and his prayer-book o' Sundays both in a pew?"

So fond was Ben Jonson of this tavern, that he lived "without Temple Bar, at a combmaker's shop," according to Aubrey, in order to be near his favourite haunt. It must have been, therefore, in a moment of ill-humour, when he found fault with the wine, and made the statement that his play of the "Devil is an Ass," (which is certainly not amongst his best,) was written "when I and my boys drank bad wine at the Devil." But surely he would not have established his favourite Apollo Club at a place where they sold bad wine. He himself composed the famous "Leges Convivales" for this club, which are still preserved, with the respect due to so sacred a relic, in the banking house of Messrs Child & Co., erected in 1788 on the place where the tavern formerly stood. They are twenty-four in number, some of them rather characteristic:—

"4. And the more to exact our delight whilst we stay,
Let none be debarr'd from his choice female mate.

5. Let no scent offensive the chamber infest.

10. Let our wines without mixture or scum be all fine,
Or call up the master and break his dull noddle.

In opposition to this Old Devil a YOUNG DEVIL Tavern was opened, also in Fleet Street, in 1707, and here the first meetings of the Society of Antiquaries were held, but the "Young Devil" was not a success, and the house was soon closed.

Though the Devil is not a promising name for a public-house, owing to his near connexion with evil spirits, yet there was a third tavern named after—if not devoted to him—the LITTLE DEVIL, Goodman's Fields, Whitechapel. Ned Ward, in 1703, highly commends the punch of this house, which he partook of in "a room neat enough to entertain Venus and the graces." It was a house entirely after jolly Ned's fancy. "My landlord was good company, my landlady good humoured, her daughter charmingly pretty, and her maid tolerably handsome, who can laugh, cry, say her prayers, sing a song, all in a breath, and can turn in a minute to all sublunary points of a female compass." *

THE DEVIL (le Diable) was also a celebrated tavern in Paris, near the Palais de Justice. It is thus named in the "Ode à tous les Cabarets:"—

"Lieux sacrés où l'on est soumis
Aux saints oracles de Themis,
Encor que vous ayez la gloire,
De voir tout le monde à genoux,
Sans le Diable et la Tête-Noire,†
Je n'approcherais pas de vous."‡

In the seventeenth century Paris also had its Petit Diable, (Little Devil), a tavern of some renown.

THE DEVIL'S HOUSE was the name of a favourite Sunday resort in the last century, in the Hornsey Road, Islington. It is said to have been the retreat of Claude Duval (unde Duval's house, Devil's house,) the elegant highwayman in the reign of Charles II., who infested the lanes about Islington; but from a survey taken in 1611, it appears that the house bore already at that time the name of "Devil's House." From its general appearance it seemed to date from Queen Elizabeth's reign. It was surrounded by a moat filled with water, and passed by a wooden bridge. Its attractions are held forth in the following laudatory

* Ned Ward's "London Spy," 1703.

† La Tête Noire, (the Moor's head,) another famous tavern in that locality.

‡ "Sacred precincts, where are delivered
The holy oracles of Themis,
Though you may boast
To see everybody kneel to you,
Were it not for the Devil and the Moor's head
I would never come near you."

In such cases as the Bishop of Narbonne said about St Denis, (who walked from Montmartre to St Denis with his head under his arm,) "il n'y a que le premier pas qui coute."*

In many instances, no doubt, before the Reformation, the shopkeeper would choose his patron saint for his sign, to act as a sort of lares and penates to his house. An example of this occurs on the following imprint:—"Manual of Prayers, 1539. Imprynted in Bottol [St Botolph's] Lane, at the sygne of the WHYT BEARE, by me, Jhon Mayler, for John Waylande, and be to sell in Powles Churchyarde, by Andrew Hester, at the WHYT HORSE, and also by Mychel Lobley, at the sygne of the SAINT MYCHEL;" this last bookseller, therefore, had chosen his own patron saint for his sign. For the same reason another bookseller adopted, in the early part of the sixteenth century, SAINT JOHN THE EVANGELIST—"The Doctrynnall of Good Servauntes. Imprynted at London, in Flete Strete, at the sygne of Saynt Johan Evangelyste, by me, Johan Butler." This Butler was a judge of the Common Pleas, as well as a bookseller. About the same period the Evangelist was also the sign of another man of the same profession—"Robert Wyce, dwellinge at the sygne of Seynt Johan Euāgelyst, in Seynt Martyns parysshe, in the filde besyde Charynge Crosse, in the bysshop of Norwythe rentys." He was the printer of the well-known "Pronostycacion for ever of Erra Pater; a Jewe borne in Jewry, a doctor in Astronome and Physicke," which was continued for ages after him. Robert Wyce must have been about the first bookseller and printer in this neighbourhood, as in Queen Elizabeth's reign the parish contained less than one hundred people liable to be rated.† We find the same as one of the oldest printer's signs in France, on an edition of Merlin's Prophecies, printed at Paris in 1438, by Abraham Verard, dwelling near the church of Notre Dame, at the sign of St John the Evangelist.

Other saints, again, have a local reputation, and are perpetuated on the signboards in certain localities only, as for instance ST THOMAS of Canterbury; ST EDMUND'S HEAD, at Bury St Edmunds; and ST CUTHBERT, at Monk's house, near Sunderland. This saint was the first bishop of Northumberland.

"But fain St Hilda's nuns would learn,
If on a rock by Lindisfarne,

* St Justin, another martyr, after his head was struck off, picked it up, and, holding in his hand, conversed with the bystanders.

† Cunningham's London.

St Cuthbert sits and toils to frame
The seaborne weeds which bear his name," says Sir Walter Scott, alluding to the stalks of the Encrinites, which are called St Cuthbert's Beads, the saint, as the story goes, amusing himself by stringing them together.

Hugh Singleton, a bookseller in the sixteenth century, lived at the sign of the ST AUGUSTINE; probably he had chosen this saint from the fact of his being a distinguished writer as well as saint. George Carter, a shopkeeper in the seventeenth century, adopted ST ALBAN, the protomartyr, as his sign, evidently for no other reason but because he lived in "St Alban's Street, near St James's Market;" and another, William Ellis of Tooley Street, had the sign of ST CLEMENT, perhaps on account of his being a native of the parish of St Clement's. Trades tokens of both these houses are to be seen in the Beaufoy Collection.

St Laurent was the sign of an inn in Lawrence Lane, Cheapside, but from a border of blossoms or flowers round it, it was commonly called BLOSSOMS, or by corruption, BOSOM'S INN—such at least is the explanation of Stow:—

"Antiquities in this lane—[St Laurence Lane, Cheapside]—I find none other than that, among many fair houses, there is one large inn for the receipt of travellers called Blossom's Inn, but corruptly Bosom's Inn, and hath to sign St Laurence the deacon in a border of blossoms or flowers."

Flowers are said to have sprung up at the martyrdom of this saint, who was roasted alive on a gridiron. But in the "History of Thomas of Reading," ch. ii., another version is given, which seems, however, little else than a joke:—

"Our jolly clothiers kept up their courage and went to Bosom's Inn, so called from a greasy old fellow who built it, who always went nudging with his head in his bosom winter and summer, so that they called him the picture of old Winter."

In 1522 the Emperor Charles V. honoured Henry VIII. with a visit; at first his intention was to come with a retinue of 2044 persons and 1127 horses, but subsequently he reduced them to 2000 persons and 1000 horses. To lodge these visitors, various "inns for horses" were "seen and viewed," amongst which "St Laurance, otherwise called Bosoms Yn," is noted down to have "xx beddes and a stable for lx horses."* It is curious, in this list of inns, to observe the proportion of beds as compared with stabling room, showing how most of the followers of a nobleman on a journey had to shift for themselves and sleep in the straw or elsewhere. On the occasion of this imperial visit, the city authorities were evidently afraid of being drunk dry by the many Flemings in the train of the Emperor. To avoid this calamity, a return was made of all the wine to be found at the eleven wine merchants, and the twenty-eight principal taverns then in London, the sum total of which was 809 pipes.*

* Our Harry VIII. was fully as extravagant in his retinue. When he went over to meet Francis I. at the Camp du Drap d'or, he required 2400 beds, and stabling for 2000 horses.

In the sixteenth century the house seems already to have been famous as a carrier's inn, (which it continued for three centuries,) as appears from the following allusion:—"Yet have I naturally cherisht and hugt it in my bosome, even as a carrier at Bosome's Inne doth a cheese under his arms."† A satirical tract about Banks and his horse "Marocius Extaticus," (reprinted by the Percy Society,) gives the names of its authors as "John Dando the wiredrawer of Hadley, and Harrie Hunt, head ostler of Besomes Inne." Another domestic of this establishment is handed down to posterity in Ben Jonson's "Masque of Christmas," presented at Court in 1616, where the following lines occur:—

"But now comes Tom of Bosom's Inn,
And he presenteth Misrule."‡

The CATHERINE WHEEL was formerly a very common sign, most likely adopted from its being the badge of the order of the knights of Saint Catherine of Mount Sinai, created anno 1063, for the protection of pilgrims on their way to and from the Holy Sepulchre. Hence it was a suggestive, if not eloquent sign for an inn, as it intimated that the host was of the brotherhood, although in a humble way, and would protect the travellers from robbery in his inn,—in the shape of high charges and exactions,—just as the knights of St Catherine protected them on the high road from robbery by brigands. These knights wore a white habit embroidered with a Catherine wheel, (i.e. a wheel armed with spikes,) and traversed with a sword stained

* "Rutland Papers," reprinted for Camden Society.

† Epistle Dedicatory to "Have at you to Saffron Walden," 1596.

‡ "Misrule in a velvet cap, a sprig, a short cloak, a great yellow ruff, like a reveller, his torch bearer bearing a rope, a cheese, and a basket." The names given were the real designations of the performers in private life. Kit, the cobbler of Philipot Lane; Ole, a cook's wife from Scalding Alley; Nell, a milliner from Threadneedle Street; and Tom, our drawer from Blossom's Inn.

"And he presenteth Misrule,
Which you may know by the very show,
Albeit you never ask it;
For there you may see, what his ensignes bee,
The rope, the cheese, and the basket."

xc. 13, where the godly are reminded :—"Thou shalt tread upon the Lion and Adder, the young lion and the dragon shalt thou trample under feet." These two signs apparently came in use during the Commonwealth. They have a decided flavour of the time when Scripture language formed the common speech of every day life.

The LAMB AND FLAG is another sign common all over England, representing originally the holy lamb with the nimbus and banner, but now so little understood by the publicans, that on an ale-house at Swindon, it is pictured with a spear, to which a red-white-and-blue streamer is appended. It may also be of heraldic origin, for it was the coat of arms of the Templars, and the crest of the merchant tailors. The LAMB AND ANCHOR, Milk Street, Bristol, seems to be a mystical representation of hope in Christ; both these last signs date from before the Reformation. From that period also dates the sign of the BLEEDING HEART, the emblematical representation of the five sorrowful mysteries of the Rosary, viz., the heart of the Holy Virgin pierced with five swords. There is still an ale-house of this name in Charles Street, Hatton Garden, and Bleeding Heart Yard, adjoining the public-house, is immortalised in "Little Dorrit." The WOUNDED HEART, one of the signs in Norwich in 1750,* had the same meaning. The Heart was a constant emblem of the Holy Virgin in the middle ages; thus, on the clog almanacs, all the feasts of St Mary were indicated by a heart. It was not an uncommon sign in former times. The HEART AND BALL appears on a trades token as the sign of a house in Little Britain, the Ball being simply some silk mercer's addition; and the GOLDEN HEART† was a sign in Greenwich in 1737, next door to which Dr Johnson used to live when he was newly come to town, and wrote the Parliamentary articles for the Gentleman's Magazine. At present there are three public-houses with this sign in Bristol, and in other places it may be met with.

HEAVEN was a house of entertainment near Westminster Hall; the present committee rooms of the House of Commons are erected on its site. Butler alludes to this house in "Hudibras," p. 3:—

"False Heaven at the end of the Hall."

Pepys records his dining at this house in the winter of 1660,

* Gentleman's Magazine, March 1842.

† It is said that this sign, put up in French somewhere as the cœur doré, was Englished into the "queer loor."

Their offerings are recorded in the following charm against falling sickness :—

“Jaspar fert myrrham, thus Melchior, Balthazar aurum,
Hæc tria qui secum portabit nomina regum
Solvitur a morbo, Christi pietate, caduco.” *

Another Latin distich has—

“Tres Reges Regi Regum tria dona firebant Myrrham Homini, uncto aurum, thura dedere Deo.” †

Melchior was usually represented as a bearded old man, Jasper as a beardless youth, and Balchazar as a Moor with a large beard.

This sign was as common on the Continent as in England, and at the present day it may often be met with. Eustache Deschamps, in the sixteenth century, thus celebrated the good cheer of one of the taverns in Paris :—

“Prince, par la Vierge Marie,
On est à la Cossonerie,
Aux Cannelles ou aux Trois Rois.”

L'Adoration des Trois Rois was, in 1674, the sign of François Muguet, one of the Parisian booksellers.

Not unlikely the sign of the KINGS AND KEYS, a tavern in Fleet Street, is an abbreviation of the Three Kings and Cross Keys. At Weston-super-Mare, and at Chelmsforth, there is another sign which owes its origin to the Three Kings, namely, the THREE QUEENS. When, in 1764, the Paving Act for St James' was put into execution, the sign of the Three Queens, in Clerkenwell Green, was removed at a cost of upwards of £200 ; it extended not less than seven feet from the front of the house. Lloyd's Evening Post, January 12-14, 1761, tells how two sharpers came to this ale-house and stole the silver tankard in which their drink was served them. Each tavern in those days possessed a number of silver tankards, in which the well-dressed customers were served with sack and canary. It may be imagined that the thieves were quietly on the look-out for such a prize. The same paper gives an advertisement about two silver pints stolen from the JOLLY BUTCHERS at Bath ; in fact,

- * “Jasper brings myrrh, Melchior frankincense, Balthazar gold.
He who carries these three names of the kings about with him
Will, through Christ's favour, be delivered of the falling sickness.”

In the trial of the smugglers for the murder of Chater and Galley, excisemen of Olchester, in the last century, one of the prisoners was found with this charm in his pocket. With this scrap of paper in his possession, he had considered himself quite safe from detection.

- † “Three kings brought three gifts to the King of Kings.
They gave myrrh to him as man, gold as king, and frankincense as God.”

similar advertisements were of almost daily occurrence. "The Praise of Yorkshire Ale," 1685, also mentions—

"Selling of Ale, in Muggs, Silver Tankards, Black Pots, and Little Jugs."

One other semi-religious legend has provided a subject for many a signboard, namely, the MAN IN THE MOON. Though this cannot strictly be styled a religious legend, yet it may be included in this class, as the idea is said to have originated from the incident given in Numbers xv. 32, et seq., "And while the children of Israel were in the wilderness, they found a man that gathered sticks upon the Sabbath-day," &c. Not content with having him stoned for this desecration of the day, the legend transferred him to the moon. It is, however, a Christian legend, for the Jews had some Talmudical story about Jacob being in the moon; in fact, almost every nation, whether ancient or modern, sees somebody in it. The Man in the Moon occurs on a seventeenth century token of a tavern in Cheapside, represented by a half-naked man within a crescent, holding on by the horns. There is still a sign of this description in Little Vine Street, Regent Street, and in various other places. Generally he is represented with a bundle of sticks, a lanthorn (which, one would think, he did not want in the moon,) and frequently a dog. Thus Chaucer depicts him in "Cresside," v. 260:—

"Her gite was gray and full of spottes blacke,
And on her breast a churl painted full even,
Bearing a bush of thorns on his backe,
Which for his theft might clime no ner y^e heven."

Shakespeare also alludes to him:—

"Steph. I was the Man in the Moon when time was.

"Caliban. I have seen thee in her, and I do adore thee; my mistress showed me thee, thy dog and bush."—Tempest, ii., sc. 2.

Also—

"Quince. One must come in with a bush of thorns and a lanthorn, and say he comes to disfigure or to present the person of moonshine."—Midsummer Night's Dream, iii., sc. 1.

This bunch of thorns is alluded to by Dante, "Inferno," canto xx. 124, where the Man in the Moon is spoken of as Cain—

"Ma viene omai: che già tiene il confine D' amendus gli emisperi e tocca l'onda
Sotto Sibia Caino è le spine." *

* "But come now, for already hovers Cain with his bundle of thorns
On the confines of the two hemispheres, and touches the Waves beneath Seville."

And again in "Paradiso," canto ii. 49, speaking of the moon, he asks—

"Ma detemi, che sono i segni bui
Di questi corpo, che laggioso in terra
Fan di Cain favoleggiare altrui?"*

And the annotators of Dante say that Cain was placed in the moon with a bundle of thorns on his back, similar to those he had placed on the altar when he offered to the Lord his unwelcome sacrifice. This Man in the Moon, whether Cain, Jacob, or the Sabbath-breaker, has been celebrated by innumerable songs. Alex. Neckham (recently edited by Mr T. Wright) refers to him from a very ancient ballad, and one of the oldest songs is in the Harl. MSS., 2253, beginning :—

"Mon in the mone stond and streit,
On is bot-forke is burthen he bereth,
Hit is mucche wonder that he na doun slyt
For doute lest he valle he shoddreth and skereth.
When the forst freseth mucche chele he byd
The thornes beth kene is hattren to-tereth
N'is no wytht in the world that wot when he syt
Ne, bote hit bee the hegge, whot wedes he wereth."

For all this, his life seems to be very merry, for one of the Roxburgh Ballads (i. f., 298) informs us that—

"Our Man in the Moon drinks Clarret,
With powderbeef, turnep and carret;
If he doth so, why should not you
Drink until the sky looks blue."

From whence they obtained the information it is difficult to say, but it was a well-established fact with the old tobaccoconists that he could enjoy his pipe. Thus he is represented on some of the tobaccoconists' papers in the Banks Collection puffing like a steam-engine, and underneath the words, "Who'll smoake with y^e Man in y^e Moon?" If these frequent allusions in songs and plays were not enough to remind the Londoners that there was such a being, they could see him daily amongst the figures of old St Paul's—

"The Great Dial is your last monument; where bestow some half of the three score minutes to observe the sauciness of the Jacks† that are above the Man in the Moon there; the strangeness of their motion will quit your labour."—DECKER's Gull's Hornbook.

* "But tell me, what are the dark spots
On that body, which makes them down there on earth
Talk of Cain and the bundle of thorns!"

† Paul's Jacks were the little automaton figures that struck the hours in old St Paul's. Similar puppets, or figures, were also on other London churches.

of this visit is still preserved at the above house in an engraving of the princess, from a picture by Hans Holbein, hung up in the coffee-room; and the dish from which she ate her dinner still remains, it is said, affixed to the kitchen dresser there. There is a tradition that the bells of All Hallows were rung on this occasion with such energy, that the queen presented the ringers with silken ropes.

A more painful association is connected with another King's Head:—

"In a secluded part of the Oxfordshire hills, at a place called Collins End, situated between Hardwicke House and Goring Heath, is a neat little rustic inn, having for its sign a well-executed portrait of Charles I. There is a tradition that this unfortunate monarch, while residing as a prisoner at Caversham, rode one day, attended by an escort, into this part of the country, and hearing that there was a bowling-green at this inn, frequented by the neighbouring gentry, struck down to the house, and endeavoured to forget his sorrows for a while in a game at bowls. This circumstance is alluded to in the following lines, written beneath the signboard:—

"Stop, traveller, stop, in yonder peaceful glade,
His favourite game the royal martyr play'd.
Here, stripp'd of honours, children, freedom, rank,
Drank from the bowl, and bowl'd for what he drank;
Sought in a cheerful glass his cares to drown,
And changed his guinea ere he lost his crown." *

The sign, which seems to be a copy from Vandyke, though much faded from exposure to the weather, evidently displayed an amount of artistic skill not usually met with on the signboard; but the only information the people of the house could give was, that they believed it to have been painted in London. His son, Charles II., is also connected in an anecdote with a King's Head Tavern, in the Poultry, for it is reported that he stopped at this inn on the day of his entry at the Restoration, at the request of the landlady, who happened just then to be in labour, and wished to salute his majesty. Mrs King, the lady so honoured, was aunt to William Bowyer, "the learned printer of the eighteenth century." In Ben Jonson's time there was a famous King's Head Tavern in New Fish Street, "where roysters did range." It is this tavern, probably, that is alluded to in the ballad of "The Ranting Wh——'s Resolution:—"

"I love a young Heir
Whose fortune is fair,
And frolick in Fish Street dinners,

* Notes and Queries

accordingly placed in the chair and ducked in the river Thames, under Kingston Bridge, in the presence of 2000 or 3000 people."—London Evening Post, Ap. 27, 1745.

Full particulars of such an operation are given by Misson :—

"They fasten an arm-chair to the end of two strong beams, twelve or fifteen feet long, and parallel to each other. The chair hangs upon a sort of axle, on which it plays freely, so as to remain in the horizontal position. The scold being well fastened in her chair, the two beams are then placed as near to the centre as possible, across a post on the water side, and being lifted up behind, the chair of course drops into the cold element. The ducking is repeated according to the degree of shrewdness possessed by the patient, and generally has the effect of cooling her immoderate heat, at least for a time."

At the King's Head, Strutton, near Ipswich, about ten years ago, there was the following inscription :—

"Good people, stop, and pray walk in,
Here's foreign brandy, rum, and gin,
And, what is more, good purl and ale,
Are both sold here by old Nat Dale."

Old Nat had lived for a period of eighty years under the shadow of the King's Head.

Combinations with the King's Head are not very frequent. The KING'S HEAD AND LAMB, an ale-house in Upper Thames Street, is evidently a quartering of two signs. The Two KINGS AND STILL, sign of Henry Francis in Newmarket, 1667,* representing a still between two kings crowned, holding their sceptres, may have originated from the distillers' arms, the two wild men, serving as supporters, being refined into two kings, the garlands on their heads into crowns, and their clubs into sceptres.

That Queen Elizabeth was for more than two centuries the almost unvarying type of the QUEEN'S HEAD need not be wondered at when we consider her well-deserved popularity. A striking instance of the veneration and esteem in which she was held, even through all the tribulations and changes of the Commonwealth, is exhibited in the fact of the bells ringing on her birthday, as late as the reign of Charles II. :—

"The Earl of Dorset coming to court, one Queen Elisabeth's birthday, the king [Charles II.] asked him what the bells rung for! which having answered, the king farther asked him, 'how it came to pass that her holiday was still kept, whilst those of his father and grandfather were no more thought of than William the Conqueror's!' 'Because,' said the frank peer to the frank king, 'she being a woman, chose men for her counsellors; and men, when they reign, usually chuse women.'"^{*}

* Akerman's Trades Tokens.

During the queen's lifetime, however, the sign-painters had to mind how they represented "Queen Bess," for Sir Walter Raleigh says that portraits of the queen "made by unskilful and common painters" were, by her own order, "knocked in pieces, and cast into the fire."[†] A proclamation had been issued to that effect, in the year 1563, saying that:—

"Forasmuch as through the natural desire that all sorts of subjects and people, both noble and mean, have to procure the portrait and picture of the Queen's Majestie, great number of Paynters, and some Printers and Gravers have allredy, and doe daily, attempt to make in divers manners portraictures of hir Majestie, in paynting, graving, and prynting, wherein is evidently shewn, that hytherto none hath sufficiently expressed the naturall representation of hir Majesties person, favor, or grace, but for the most part have also erred therein, as thereof daily complaints are made amongst hir Majesties loving subjects, in so much, that for redress hereof hir Majestie hath lately bene so instantly and so importunately sued by the Lords of hir Consell, and others of hir nobility, in respect of the great disorder herein used, not only to be content that some special coning payntor might be permitted by access to hir Majestie to take the naturall representation of hir Majestie, whereof she hath been allwise of hir own right disposition very unwilling, but also to prohibit all manner of other persons to draw, paynt, grave, or pourtrayit hir Majesties personage or visage for a time, until by some perfect patron and example the same may be by others followed.

"Therfor hir Majestie, being herein as it were overcome with the continually requests of so many of hir Nobility and Lords, whom she can not well deny, is pleased that for thir contentations, some coning persons, mete therefore, shall shortly make a pourtraict of hir person or visage, to be participated to others, for satisfaction of hir loving subjects; and furthermore commandeth all manner of persons in the mean tyme to forbear from paynting, graving, printing, or making of any pourtraict of hir Majestie, untill some special person that shall be by hir allowed, shall have first fynished a pourtraicture thereof, after which finished, hir Majestie will be content that all other painters, printers, or gravers that shall be known men of understanding, and so thereto licensed by the hed officers of the plaices where they shall dwell, (as reason it is that every person should not without consideration attempt the same,) shall and maye at their pleasures follow the sayd patron or first portraicture. And for that hir Majestie perceiveth that a grete number of hir loving subjects are much greved and take grete offence with the errors and deformities allredy committed by sondry persons in this behalf, she straightly chargeth all her officers and ministers to see to the observation hereof, and, as soon as may be, to reform the errors allredy committed, and in the mean tyme to forbydd and prohibit the shewing and publication of such as are apparently deformed, until they may be reformed which are reformable.”*

* "Richardsoniana." London, 1776, p. 159.

† Preface to his "History of the World."

That there were signboards, however, representing her Majesty's "person, favour, and grace," during her lifetime, is evident from the fact that an ancestor of Pennant, the London topographer, made his fortune as a goldsmith at the sign of the QUEEN'S HEAD, in Smithfield, during the reign of good Queen Bess.

The irascible Mr Boursault, whose bile was so often deranged by signboard irregularities, took also sycophantic exception at royal heads being represented in that way :

"Je souffre impatiemment que le portrait du Roy, celuy de la Reine, de Monseigneur et des autres Princes et Princesses, servent d'enseignes de boutiques; eux qui ne devroient faire l'ornement que des plus célèbres galeries et des plus illustres cabinets. Monsieur d'Argenson et Vous même, Monsieur le Commissaire, n'auriez-vous pas juste raison de vous facher de voir votre portrait servir d'enseigne à la Maison d'un cabaretier, ou à la boutique d'un Fripier; et pourquoi donc ne vous fachez-vous pas de ce que celui du Roy y est!"†

Of celebrated Queen's Heads we must begin with the highly respectable inn of that name, in which, before the reign of Queen Elizabeth, lived the canonists and professors of spiritual and ecclesiastical law. It was situated in Paternoster Row, where its name is still preserved in Queen's Head Alley. From this place the lawyers removed to Doctors' Commons.

Nearly as ancient a building was the old Queen's Head, Lower Street, Islington, at the corner of Queen's Head Lane, one of the most perfect specimens of ancient domestic architecture in the vicinity of London. It is said that it was built by Sir Walter Raleigh, after he had obtained "lycense for keeping of taverns and retayling of wyne throughout Englande," and that it was called by him the Queen's Head in compliment to his royal mistress. Essex is also said to have resided there, and to have been visited by the queen. The same tradition is current about the Lord Treasurer Burleigh. In the reign of George II. it was used as a playhouse, and bills are still extant of plays acted there at that period.

* Archæologia, II., p. 160. In an article in "Notes and Queries," No. 150, a document is quoted by which George Gower was appointed "the Queen's Sargeant Paynter," and Nicolas Hilliard her miniature portrait painter. No portraits of the queen painted by Gower appear, however, to be known.

† Lettre à M. Bizotin. "I cannot bear to see the portraits of the king, of the queen, of the dauphin, and of the other princes and princesses used as signs for shops; they whose portraits ought to be reserved for the most celebrated galleries and the most famous collections only. Would not M. d'Argenson, and you as well, M. le Commissaire, have very serious reason to be annoyed if you were to see your portrait as a sign to a public-house or to a rag-shop? Why, then, are you not annoyed in seeing the king's portrait in such places?" Mr Boursault's flattery is much more evident than his logic.

It was a strong wood and plaster building, three lofty stories high, projecting over each other, and forming bay windows supported by brackets and caryatides. Inside it was panelled with wainscot, and had stuccoed ceilings, adorned with dolphins, cherubims, and acorns, bordered by a wreath of flowers. The porch was supported by caryatides of oak, crowned with scroll-capitals.* This time-honoured structure was pulled down in October 1829, and nothing of it remains in the new building erected on its site but the name, the carved oak panels of the parlour, and a bust of Queen Elizabeth at the top front. A carved mantelpiece, (formerly in the parlour of the old house,) with the history of Dian and Actæon on it, (a favourite subject with the virgin queen,) was sold for more than £60 at the sale of the building materials, most of which were bought by anti-quaries.

There used to be a large pewter tankard in this house, with an inscription engraved on it, which is much too highly spiced to be given here. It was signed John Cranch, and bore date 1796.

At the Queen's Head, Duke Court, Bow Street, the English language was enriched with two new terms, though one of them seems to have been still-born. This tavern was once kept by a facetious individual of the name of Jupp. Two celebrated characters, Annesley Shay and Bob Todrington—the latter a sporting man—meeting late in the day at the above place, went to the bar and asked for half a quartern each, with a little cold water. In the course of the evening they drank twenty-four, when Shay said to the other, "Now we'll go." "Oh no," replied his companion, "we'll have another, and then go." This did not satisfy the Hibernian, and they continued drinking on till three in the morning, when they both agreed to go; so that under the idea of going they made a long stay, and this was the origin of drinking goes; but another preferring to eke out the measure his own way, used to call for a quartern at a time, and these in the exercise of his humour he called stays.†

In the beginning of this century, when Marylebone consisted of "green fields, babbling brooks," and pleasant suburban retreats,

* There is a print of it in Gentleman's Magazine, June 1794.

† "Memoirs of J. Decastro, comedian," London, 1824. See under "Go," (as "a go of gin," "a go of rum,") in the "Slang Dictionary," 3d edition: John Camden Hotten, Piccadilly, London.

there was a small but picturesque house of public entertainment, yecept the QUEEN'S HEAD AND ARTICHOKE, situated "in a lane nearly opposite Portland Road, and about 500 yards from the road that leads from Paddington to Finsbury"—now Albany Street. Its attractions chiefly consisted in a long skittle and "bumble puppy" ground, shadowy bowers, and abundance of cream, tea, cakes, and other creature comforts. The only memorial now remaining of the original house is an engraving in the Gentleman's Magazine, November 1819. The queen was Queen Elizabeth, and the house was reported to have been built by one of her gardeners, whence the strange combination on the sign.

Besides Crowns (see p. 101) other royal paraphernalia are occasionally used as signboard decorations. The SCEPTRE is not uncommon; the SCEPTRE AND HEART was the sign of Samuel Grover, chirurgical instrument maker, on London Bridge, in the latter end of the seventeenth century. It is engraved on his shop-bill, and represents a circle surrounded by fruit and foliage, having two Cupids standing at the upper corner, and containing in the centre two palm branches enclosing a sceptre surmounted by a heart. Round the whole are suspended lancets, trepans, saws, &c. In all probability it is simply a quartering of two signs.

The ROYAL HAND AND GLOBE was the loyal sign of a stationer at the corner of St Martin's Lane, in 1682.* It doubtless refers to the royal hand holding the golden orb, surmounted by a cross. It is still the sign of an ale-house near the Soho Theatre. The same orb or globe seems to be alluded to in the sign of the SWORD AND BALL, on Holborn Bridge, in the seventeenth century. What stands in the way of this explanation, however, is that on the token of this house the sword is represented piercing the ball; but this may merely have been a fancy of the sign-painter, who did not understand its meaning. As for the SWORD AND MACE, the meaning is perfectly clear; it is the sign of a public-house in Coventry.

The Church is almost as abundantly represented as royalty. Even long after the Reformation the POPE'S HEAD was still very common. Nash's "Anatomie of Absurdities" was printed by T. Charlwood for Thomas Hacket, and was "to be sold at his shop in Lumbard Street, vnder the signe of the Popes Heade, 1590." Taylor, the Water poet, in his "Travels through London," 1636, mentions four Pope's Head taverns; but the most famous of all was the Pope's Head tavern in Cornhill.

* London Gazette, Nov. 30 to Dec. 4, 1682.

"I have read* of a countryman that, having lost his hood in Westminster Hall, found the same in Cornhill hanged out to be sold, which he challenged, but was forced to buy, or go without it, for their stall they said was their market. At that time also the wine drawers at the Pope's Head tavern (standing without the door in the High Street,† took the same man by the sleeve, and said, 'Sir, will you drink a pint of wine?' Whereunto he answered, 'A penny spend I may,' and so drank his pint, for bread nothing did he pay, for that was allowed free.‡ This Pope's Head tavern, with other houses adjoining, strongly built of stone, hath of old time been all in one, pertaining to some great estate, or rather to the king, as may be supposed both by the largeness thereof, and by the arms, to wit, three leopards passant gardant, which were the whole arms of England before the reign of Edward III., that quartered them with the arms of France three flower de lys. Some say this was King John's house, which might be, for I find in a written copy of 'Matthew Paris's History' that in the year 1232, Henry III. sent Hubert de Burgh, earl of Kent, to Cornhill in

* In Lydgate's ballad of "London Lyckpenny," temp. Henry VI.

† This touting, or standing at the door inviting the passers by to enter, was at one time a universal practice with all kind of shops, both at home and abroad. The regular phrase used to be "What do ye lack? What do ye lack?" The French dits and fabliaux teem with allusions to this custom. In the story of "Courtois d'Arras,"—a travesty of the prodigal son, in a thirteenth century garb—Courtois finds the host standing at his door shouting, "Bon vin de Soissons à 6 deniers le lot." And in a mediæval mystery, entitled "Li Jus de S. Nicholas," the innkeeper roars out, "Céans il fait bon dîner, céans il y a pain chaud et harengs chauds et vin d'Auxerre à plein tonneau." In "Les trois Aveugles de Compiègne," mine host thus addresses the thirsty wanderers:—

"Ci a bon vin fres et nouvel,
Ca d'Ancoire, ça de Soissons
Pain et char et vin et poissons,
Céans fet bon despendre argent,
Ostel i a à toute gent,
Céans fet moult bon heberger."

And in the "Debats et facétieuses rencontres de Gringalet et de Guillot Gorgen son maistre," the servant who had taken advantage of the host's invitation, excuses himself, saying, "Le tavernier a plus de tort que moy, car passant devant sa porte, et luy étant assis, (ainsi qu'ils sont ordinairement), il me cria me disant: Vous plaist-il de déjeuner céans? Il y a de bon pain, de bon vin et de bonne viande." This touting at tavern doors was still practised in the last century, as appears from the following passage in Tom Brown:—"We were jogging forward into the city, when our Indian cast his eyes upon one of his own complexion, at a certain coffee-house which has the Sun staring its sign in the face, even at midnight, when the moon is queen regent of the planets, and, being willing to be acquainted with his countryman, gravely inquired what province or kingdom of India he belonged to; but the sooty dog could do nothing but grin, and show his teeth, and cry, Coffee, sir, tea, will you please to walk in, sir; a fresh pot, upon my word."—Tom Brown, vol. III., p. 17. Not only taverns but all sorts of shops kept these barking advertisements at the door. The ballad of "London Lyckpenny" enumerates a quantity of them. "What do you lack?" was the stereotype phrase. The "Buy, buy, what'll you buy?" of the butchers, is one of the last remains in London of this custom. At Greenwich, the practice of touting at the doors of the small coffee-houses is still kept up; and throughout the United States and Canada the custom of waiting at steamboat wharves and railway termini, to catch passengers, and worry them with recommendations to this or that hotel, is unpleasantly prevalent. The touters there are known as hotel runners.

‡ "Wine one pint for a pennie, and bread to drink it was given free in every tavern."
—Note by Stow. The imperfect tense shows that this excellent custom had already fallen into disuse in Stow's time.

London, there to answer all matters objected against him : when he wisely acquitted himself. The Pope's Head tavern hath a footway through from Cornhill into Lombard Street."—Stow's Survey, p. 75.

In this tavern, in the fourth of Edward IV. (1464,) a trial of skill was held between Oliver Davy, goldsmith of London, and White Johnson, "Alicante Strangeour," also of London,—the London goldsmiths being divided into native and "foren" workmen. These last, though they might be Englishmen, were so named merely as a distinction with respect to the work they produced, which consisted frequently in counterfeit articles and bad gold. The trial consisted in making, in four pieces of steel the size of a penny, a cat's face in relief, and another cat's face engraved, a naked man in relief, and another engraved, which work was to be performed in five weeks. Oliver Davy, the native goldsmith, won the wager, as White Johnson, the foreign workman, after six weeks could only produce the two "inward engraved" objects. The forfeit was a crown, and a dinner to the wardens, the umpires, and all those concerned in the wager. The works were kept in Goldsmith's Hall, "to y^{at} intent that they be redy iff any suche controursey herafter falls, to be shewede that suche traverse hathe be determyn'd aforetymes."* In Pepys's time this tavern, like many others of that period and later, had a painted room. "18 January 1668.—To the Pope's Head, there to see the fine-painted room which Rogerson told me of, of his doing, but I do not like it at all, though it be good for such a publick room." Here in 1718 Quin killed his brother actor Bowen. "On Thursday s'ennight at night, Mr Bowen and Mr Quin, two comedians, drinking at the Pope's Head tavern in Cornhill, quarrelled, drew their swords, and fought, and the former was run into the guts ; he languished till Sunday last, and then died. Bowen, before he expired, desired that Mr Quin might not be prosecuted, because what had happened to him was his own seeking."† The jury brought in a verdict of manslaughter, and Quin for the offence was burned in the hand.‡ The quarrel was rather a foolish one, arising out of a wager which of the two was the honester man, which had been decided in favour of Quin ; inde ira. This tavern seems to have continued in existence till the latter part of the last century.

* Will Herbert, "History of the Twelve Great Living Companies," vol. II. p. 197.

† Weekly Journal, April 26, 1718.

‡ Ibid., July 12, 1718.

The emblem of another class of high dignitaries of the Roman Catholic Church, the CARDINAL'S HAT or CAP, was at one time common in England. Bagford says: "You have not meney of them, they war set up by sune that had ben saruants to Tho. Wolsey."* But we find the sign long before Wolsey's time, for in 1459, Simon Eyre

"Gave the Tavern called the Cardinal's Hat in Lumbard Street, with a tenement annexed on the East part of the tavern, and a mansion behind the East tenement, together with an alley from Lumbard Street to Cornhill, with the appurtenances, all which were by him new built, towards a brotherhood of our Lady in St Mary Woolnots."—Stow, p. 77.

This tavern and another of the same name, also in Lombard Street, were still extant in the seventeenth century. It was also the sign of one of the Stairs on the Bankside, the name of which is still preserved to that locality in Cardinal Cap's Alley.

"But at the naked stewes
I understands howe that
The sygne of the Cardinall's hat
That inne is now shit up."

SKELTON's Whye come ye not to Courte.

These houses, by proclamation of 37, Henry VIII., were "whited and painted with signes on the front for a token of the said houses;" they were under the jurisdiction of the Bishop of Winchester, whence Pennant makes some sly remarks upon the sign of the Cardinal's Cap:—

"I will not give into scandal so far as to suppose that this house was peculiarly protected by any coeval member of the sacred college. Neither would I by any means insinuate that the Bishops of Winchester and Rochester, or the abbots of Waverley, or of St Augustine in Canterbury, or of Battel, or of Hyde, or the Prior of Lewis, had there their temporary residences for them or their trains, for the sake of these conveniences, in that period of cruel and unnatural restriction," &c.†

The BISHOP'S HEAD was, in 1663, the sign of J. Thompson, a bookseller and publisher in St Paul's Churchyard. At this house, in 1708, was published Hatton's "New View of London;" it was then in the occupation of Robert Knaplock.

More general, however, was the MITRE, which was the sign of several famous taverns in London in the seventeenth century. There was one in Great Wood Street, Cheapside, (called on the trades token of the house the MITRE AND ROSE,) mentioned by

* Harl. MSS. 5910, part II.

† "Account of London," p. 60, 1713.

Pepys as "a house of the greatest note in London."* The landlord of this house, named Proctor, died at Islington of the plague in 1665, in an insolvent state, though he had been "the greatest vintner for some time in London for great entertainments." There was another Mitre near the west end of St Paul's, the first music-house in London. The name of the master was Robert Herbert alias Forges. Like many brother-publicans, he was, besides being a lover of music, also a collector of natural curiosities, as appears by his "Catalogue of many natural rarities, with great industrie, cost, and thirty years' travel into foreign countries, collected by Robert Herbert, alias Forges, Gent, and sworn servant to his Majesty; to be seen at the place called the Musick house at the Mitre, near the West End of S. Paul's Church, 1664."

This collection, or at least a great part of it, was bought by Sir Hans Sloane. It is conjectured that the Mitre was situated in London House Yard, at the north-west end of St Paul's, on the spot where, afterwards, stood the house known by the sign of the GOOSE AND GRIDIRON. Ned Ward† describes the appearance of another music-house of the same name in Wapping, which he calls "the Paradise of Wapping," though more probably it was in Shadwell, where there is still a Music House Court, which seems to point to some such origin. His description of this prototype of the Oxford and Alhambra music-halls is not a little amusing. The music, consisting of fiddles, hautboys, and a humdrum organ, he compares to the grunting of a hog added as a base to a concert of caterwauling cats in the height of their ecstasy. The music-room was richly decorated with paintings, (Hornfair was one of the pictures,) carvings, and gilding; the seats were like pews in a church, and the orchestra railed in like a chancel. The musicians occasionally went round to collect contributions, as they still do in the Cafés Chantants of the Champs Elysées, Paris. The other rooms in the house were "furnished for the entertainment of the best of companies," all painted with humorous subjects. The kitchen, used at that period in many taverns as a sitting room by the customers, was railed in and ornamented in the same gaudy style as the rest of the houses; a quantity of canary birds were suspended on the walls. Underground was a tippling sanctuary painted with drunken women tormenting the devil, and other somewhat quaint subjects. The occasion has a festive air about it that cannot fail to make a lively impression on his readers:—

* Pepys's Memoirs, Sept. 18, 1660.

† "London Spy," 1704.

"He agreed to meet me in the evening at the Mitre. I called on him, and we went thither at nine. We had a good supper, and port wine, of which he then sometimes drank a bottle. The orthodox high church sound of the Mitre,—the figure and manner of the celebrated Samuel Johnson—the extraordinary power and precision of his conversation and the pride from finding myself admitted as his companion, produced a variety of sensations and a pleasing elevation of mind beyond what I had ever experienced."

There, also, that amusing scene with the young ladies from Staffordshire took place, which would make an excellent companion picture to Leslie's "Uncle Toby and the Widow Wadman."

"Two young women from Staffordshire visited him when I was present to consult him on the subject of Methodism, to which they were inclined. Come (said he) you pretty fools, dine with Maxwell and me at the Mitre, and we will talk over that subject, which they did; and after dinner, he took one of them on his knees and fondled them for half an hour together."

Hogarth, too, was an occasional visitor at this tavern. A card is still extant, wherein he requested the company of Dr Arnold King to dine with him at the Mitre. The written part is contained within a circle, (representing a plate) to which a knife and fork are the supporters. In the centre is drawn a pie with a Mitre on the top of it, and the invitation—

*Mr Hogarth's compliments to Mr King, and desires the honour of his company to dinner, on Thursday next, to η. β. π. [Eta beta py.] **

In this tavern the Society of Antiquaries used to meet, before apartments were obtained in Somerset House.

"The Society hitherto having no house of their own, meet every Thursday evening, about seven o'clock, at the Mitre Tavern in Fleet Street, where antiquities are produced and considered, draughts and impressions thereof taken, dissertations read, and minutes of the several transactions entered, and the whole economy under such admirable regulations, that probably in a short time they may apply for a royal power of incorporation." †

In the bar of the Mitre Tavern in St James' Market, which was kept by her aunt, (Mrs Voss, formerly the mistress of Sir Godfrey Kneller,) Captain Farquhar overheard Miss Nancy Oldfield read the play of "The Scornful Lady," and was so struck with the

* Erskine used to send somewhat similar cards of invitation when on the Bench, by drawing a turtle on a card, and sending it to a friend, with the day and hour.

† Maitland's History of London, 1739, p. 647.

proper emphasis and agreeable turn she gave to each character, that he swore the girl was cut out for the stage. Captain (afterwards Sir John) Vanbrugh, a friend of the family, recommended her to Rich, and shortly after she made her debut at Covent Garden, with an allowance of fifteen shillings a week.

Though a dozen other famous Mitre Taverns might be mentioned, these are sufficient to show how general a sign it was; the partiality of tavern-keepers for it is somewhat accounted for in the following stanza of the "Quack Vintners," 1712:—

"May Smith, whose prosperous mitre is his sign,
To shew the church no enemy to wine;
Still draw such Christian liquor none may think,
Tho' e'er so pious, 'tis a sin to drink." *

The Mitre also is found in a few combinations, as the MITRE AND DOVE, i. e., the Holy Ghost, in King Street, Westminster; the MITRE AND KEYS, in Leicester—evidently the Cross Keys, which are a charge in the arms of several bishoprics; and the MITRE AND ROSE, which, from trades tokens, appears to have been the sign of a tavern in the Strand, as well as in Wood Street, Cheapside.

That the friars were also honoured on the signboard appears from "Fryar Lane, on the south side of Thames Street, near Dowgate. It was formerly called Greenwich Lane, but of later years Fryar's Lane, from the sign of a Fryar sometime there." † Probably it was a BLACK FRIAR, or Dominican Monk, for that order, above all others, had the reputation of being great toppers, and therefore were not out of place on a signboard. There is a prayer extant of the holy fathers, addressed to St Dominic:—

"Sanctus Dominicus sit nobis semper amicus
Qui canimus nostro jugiter præconia rostro,
De cordis venis, siccatis ante lagenis;
Ergo tuas laudes si tu nos pangere gaudes,
Tempore paschali, fac ne potu puteali
Conveniat uti; quod si fit, undique muti
Semper erunt patres qui, non curant nisi fratres." ‡

* * The Quack Vintners, or a Satyr against Bad Wine," 1713; probably a pamphlet got up by the London vintners against Brook and Hilliers, the famous wine merchants recommended by the Spectator.

† Hatton's New View of London, 1708, p. 32.

‡ "Saint Dominic be always our friend,

Who sing thy praises daily in our pulpit,
From the veins of our hearts, after we have emptied our flagons;
Therefore if thou rejoicest to hear us set forth thy praise,
Make that in Easter time we of spring water
Need not drink, for if that were to happen, everywhere
They will be mute monks, who do not run about unless they be friars."

And an old French couplet gives the following gradations of the potatory capacities of the different orders, in which the Franciscans only are said to beat the Dominicans :—

“Boire à la Capucine,
C'est boire pauvrement;
Boire à la Célestine,
C'est boire largement;
Boire à la Jacobine,
C'est chopine à chopine;
Mais boire en Cordelier,
C'est vider le cellier.” *

Tokens are extant of a music-house, with the sign of the Black-friar, dated 1671. In Paris also, the Bacchic propensities of the Black-friars made a tavern-keeper of the seventeenth century choose St DOMINIC as the patron saint of his tavern. His principal customers, who formed a sort of club, were called Dominicans; a contemporary song thus gives the rule of this order :—

“Nous sommes dix, tous grands buveurs;
Bons ivrognes et grands fumeurs,
Qui ne cessant jamais de boire,
Et de remuer la machoire,
Méprisons d'amour les faveurs.” †

Nuns also figured on the signboard as the THREE NUNS, which was constantly used by drapers; not exactly, as Tom Brown says, “very dismally painted to keep up young women's antipathy to popery and” single blessedness, but because the holy sisterhoods were generally very expert in making lace embroidery, and other fancy work—as the handkerchiefs made by the nuns of Pau, and sold by our drapers, fully prove even at the present day. In the seventeenth century, the Three Nuns was the sign of a well-known coaching and carriers' inn in Aldgate, which gave its name to Three Nuns' Court close at hand; near this inn was the “dreadful gulf, for such it was rather than a pit,” in which, during the

* “To drink like a Capuchin,
Is to drink poorly;
To drink like a Benedictine,
Is to drink deeply;
To drink like a Dominican,
Is pot after pot;
But to drink like a Franciscan,
Is to drink the cellar dry.”

† “We are ten, all deep drinkers,
Jolly toppers, and good smokers,
Who, never giving over drinking
And eating,
Scorn the favours of love.”

PLATE XIII.

MERCURY AND FAN.
(Banks's Collection, 1810.)

NOBODY.
(From an old print, circa 1600.)

RUNNING FOOTMAN.
(Charles Street, Berkeley Square, circa 1790.)

QUEEN ELIZABETH.
(Banks's Collection.)

Plague of 1665, not less than 1114 bodies were buried in a fortnight, from the 6th to the 20th of September.* Not improbably this sign, after the Reformation, was occasionally metamorphosed into the THREE WIDOWS: Peter Treveris, a foreigner, erected a press and continued printing until 1552 at the THREE WIDOWS in Southwark; he printed several books for William Rastell, John Reynor, R. Copeland, and others in the city of London. It is still the sign of a cap and bonnet shop in Dublin. The MATRONS, also, may have originally represented Nuns; this last hung, in the seventeenth century, at the door of John Bannister, crutch and bandage maker, near the hospital, (Christ's Hospital School,) Newgate Street. †

At the present day the CHURCH is a very common ale-house sign, either on account of the esteem in which good living has been held by churchmen in all ages, "superbis pontificum potiore cenis," or, from the proximity of a church to the ale-house in question; thus, one inn in the town would be known as the "Market House," whilst another might be known as the "Church Inn." It has been said the name was given that toppers might equivocate and say that they "frequently go to church." Be this as it may, there is generally an ale-house close to every church, (in Knightsbridge the chapel of the Holy Trinity is jammed in between two public-houses,) whereby a good opportunity is offered to wash a dry sermon down. In Bristol, at the beginning of the present century, it was still worse—a Methodist meeting-room was immediately over a public-house, which gave rise to the following epigram:—

"There's a spirit above and a spirit below,
A spirit of joy and a spirit of wee—
The spirit above is the spirit divine;
But the spirit below is the spirit of wine."

Other signs connected with the church are the CHAPEL BELL, at Sutton, in Norfolk, and the CHURCH STILE or CHURCH GATES, which is very common. The origin of this last comes from an old custom of drinking ale on the parish account, on certain occasions, at the church stile. Pepys mentions this when he was at Walthamstow, April 14, 1661:—"After dinner we all went to the church stile, and there eat and drank." To this a correspondent in the Gent. Mag. (Nov. 1852, p. 442) makes the following note:—"In an old book of accounts belonging to Warrington parish, the following minute occurs :—"Nov. 5, 1688. Paid for drink at the church steele, 13s.;" and in 1732, "It is ordered that hereafter no money be spent on ye 5th of November or any other State day on the parish account, either at the church stile or any other place." Though certainly the parish now does not pay for any ale drunk at the church stile, the sign is evidently set up in remembrance of the good old time when such things were.

* The Plague, by De Foo.

† Beaufoy Trades Tokens.

Belonging to the church was also the sign of the THREE BRUSHES, or Holy Water Sprinklers, which was that of an old house near the White Lion prison, Southwark, in which there was a room with panelled wainscoting and ceiling ornamented with the royal arms of Queen Elizabeth. Probably it had been the court-room at the time the White Lion Inn was a prison. Amongst the Beaufoy trades tokens there is one of "Rob. Thornton, haberdasher, next the Three Brushes in Southwark, 1667."

Innumerable signs were borrowed from the army and navy; thus, at the present day, every uniform in the service is represented near barracks or in other haunts of soldiers. The RECRUITING SERGEANT is generally the sign of the public-house, where that worthy spreads his nets. CROSS GUNS, CROSS LANCES, CROSS SWORDS, and CROSS PISTOLS, respectively, are meant to allure artillerymen, lancers, and various cavalry men. But above all the STANDARD, the BANNER, or the WAVING FLAG—"the glorious rag that for a thousand years has stood the battle and the breeze," is of common occurrence, not only in the neighbourhood of military quarters, but everywhere in towns and villages. At the Standard Tavern in the Strand, Edmund Curll the bookseller used to meet the mysterious Rev. Mr Smith, who told him Pope's correspondence.

"I am just going to the Lords to finish Pope," writes Curll to this person. "I desire you to send me the sheets to perfect the first fifty books, and likewise the remaining three hundred books, and pray be at the Standard Tavern this evening and I will pay you £20 more."

The KETTLEDRUM is a sign at St George-in-the-East; the DRUM and the TRUMPET are both of frequent occurrence, and the last is of old standing. One of the characters in "The Ball," a play by Shirley, 1633, thus commends the beer of the Trumpet :—

"Their strong beere is better than any I Ever drunke at the Trumpet."—The Ball, Act v.

Possibly this was the Trumpet in Shire Lane, immortalised in the Tatler, and one of the favourite haunts of merry good-natured Dick Steele. Bishop Hoadley was once present at one of the meetings in this tavern, when Steele rather exposed himself in his efforts to please, a double duty devolving upon him, as well to celebrate the "glorious memory" of King William III., it being the 4th of November—as to drink up to conversation pitch his friend Addison, the phlegmatic constitution of whom was hardly warmed for society by the time Steele was no longer fit for it. One of the company, a red hot Whig, knelt down to drink the health with all honours. This rather disconcerted the bishop, which, Steele seeing, whispered to him—"Do laugh, my lord, pray laugh; it is humanity to laugh." Shortly after Steele was put into a chair and sent home. Next morning he was much ashamed, and sent the Bishop this distich:—

"Virtue with so much ease on Bangor sits,
All faults he pardons though he none commits."

Some trades tokens are extant of houses with the sign of the Trumpet in King Street, Wapping, and in the Minories. At the same period there was a sign of the TRUMPETER in Trump Alley, probably suggested by the name of the thoroughfare.

The BUCKLER is a very old sign, and occurs in "Cocke Lorell's Bote:—

"Here is Saunder Sadeler of Froge Street Corner, With Jelyan Joly at signe of the Bokeler."

More general was the sign of the SWORD AND BUCKLER, which was frequently set up by haberdashers for the following reason:—

"And whereas, until about the twelve or thirteenth yeere of Queene Elisabeth, the auncient English fight of sword and buckler was only had in use, the bucklers then being only a foot broad, with a pike of four or five inches long; then they beganne to make them full half ell broad, with sharpe pikes 10 or 12 inches long, wherewith they meant either to breake the swordes of their enemies, if it hitte vpon the pike, or else sodainely to runne within them and stabbe, and thrust their buckler with the pike into the face, arme, and body of their adversary, but this continued not long; * every haberdasher then sold bucklers."—Stow's Chronicle.

The great prevalence of this sign originated in the so-called sword and buckler play, once so common in England. Misson,

* A proclamation of Queen Elizabeth restricted the length of the sword, rapier, and such like weapons to "one yard and half a quarter of the blade at the uttermost," and the point of the buckler not above two inches in length, under the penalty of a "fine at the Queen's pleasure, and the weapon to be forfayted, and if any such persons shall offend a second time, then the same to be banished from the place and towne of his dwelling."

who visited this country in the beginning of the eighteenth century, says :—

“ Within these few years you should often see a sort of gladiators marching through the streets, in their shirts to the waste, their sleeves tucked up, sword in hand, and preceded by a drum to gather spectators. They give so much a head to see the fight, which was with cutting swords and a kind of buckler for defence. The edge of the sword was a little blunted, and the care of the prize fighters was not so much to avoid wounding one another, as to avoid doing it dangerously ; nevertheless as they were obliged to fight till some blood was shed, without which nobody would give a farthing for the show, they were sometimes forced to play a little roughly. The fights are become very rare within these eight or ten years.”*

In the seventeenth century it was not a little rough play, which is evident from those matches at which Pepys was present, and which he describes at large. Jouvin, another Frenchman who visited England in 1672, gives a detailed account of these divertisements, which, at that period, at all events, were anything but play ; and Maitland was right when he designated them as “ a barbarous performance, by those whom necessity (occasioned by a scandalous laziness and indolence) induces to expose themselves to be horribly mangled for a little money, while the bloodily-minded spectators satiate themselves with human gore to the great reproach of religion.”

In the Spectator, No. 436, there is an amusing essay on those “ Hockley-in-the-Hole Gladiators,” and in No. 419 a letter appears, in which the deceits of the champions are shown :—

“ I overheard two masters of the science agreeing to quarrel on the next opportunity. This was to happen in the company of a set of the fraternity of the basket hilts who were to meet that evening. When this was settled, one asked the other : ‘ Will you give cuts or receive ? ’ The other answered, ‘ Receive.’ It was replied, ‘ Are you a passionate man ? ’ ‘ No, provided you cut no more, nor no deeper than we agree.’ ”

A few other instances of the Sword occur on signs, as the SWORD AND CROSS, a sort of emblem of the Church militant, or perhaps an inversion of the CROSS SWORDS : this was a sign “ next door to the Savoy Gate in 1711.” The SWORDBLADE, a coffee-house in Birchen Lane in 1718, and the SWORD AND DAGGER, a combination of arms that evokes the phantom of many a desperate duel amongst the ruffling gallants of the reign of James I. This sign of ill omen was, in the seventeenth century, in St Catherine Lane, Tower, as appears from the trade tokens issued there.

* Misson's Travels, p. 307.

The DAGGER was once common in London—

"My lawyer's clerk I lighted on last night
In Holborn at the Dagger," says Captain Face, in Ben Jonson's "Alchymist," and various trades tokens testify the prevalence of the sign. Probably this arose from its being a charge in the city arms, which was supposed to represent the dagger Sir William Walworth used in slaying Wat Tyler. This at least was asserted in the inscription below the niche in which Sir William's statue was erected in Fishmonger's Hall:—

"Brave Walworth knyght Lord Mayor yt slew Rebellious Tyler in his armes—
The king therefore did give in lieu
The Dagger to the Cytyes armes."

Stow says that this is erroneous, as, when in the 4 Richard II. a new seal was made for the city, "the armes of this city were not altered, but remayne as afore; to witte, argent, a playne cross gules a sword of Saint Paul in the first quarter and no dagger of William Walworth as is fabuled."* The DAGGER AND PIE was in the seventeenth century the sign of a celebrated pie-shop in Cheapside, the Pie being added to the original sign; but from the trades tokens of this house we see that this was represented by a rebus of a dagger with a magpie on the point. Dagger-pies are frequently mentioned in the plays of that period; for instance, in Decker's "Satyro-Mastrix:"—"I'll not take thy word for a dagger-pie;" and in Prynne's "Histrion-Mastrix," "and please you, let them be dagger-pies." The London apprentices appear to have been good customers to this house. Whenever, for example, old Hobson, the merry haberdasher, went abroad, "his prentices wold ether bee at the Taverne filling their heds with wine or at the Dagger in Cheapside cramming their bellies with minced pyes."† And in Heywood's comedy of "If you Know not me you Know Nobody," the worthy citizen bitterly inveighs against the temptations held out to apprentices by the dainties of this house:—

"Ten pounds a morning! Here is the fruit
Of Dagger-pies and Ale-house guzzling."—Act i. sc. i., 1606.

A rather curious sign was that of the RED M AND DAGGER. The letter M was the initial of Mrs Milner's name, who, at this

* Stow's Chronicle, Thom's edition, p. 83.

† Merry Jests of old Hobson the Londoner, 1611.

sign in Pope's Head Alley, "over against the Royal Exchange in Cornhill," sold the "Grand Restorative," which cured consumption, stone, dropsy, and all evils flesh is heir to. The sign occurs among the Bagford bills; there is a similar one amongst the Banks bills, the PISTOL AND C, the sign of John Crook, a razor-maker at the Great Turnstile, Holborn, circa 1787: the bill represents a renaissance scutcheon with a pistol, above it a C, and surgical instruments disseminated on the field.

Though we have the authority of Cicero that cedant arma togæ, yet booksellers, who flourish by the arts of peace, choose the HELMET for their sign. Humphrey Joy, a bookseller and printer in St Paul's Churchyard in 1550, and another, celebrated in the reigns of Henry VIII., Edward VI., and Queen Mary, Rowland Hall by name, had both a HELMET for their sign. This Hall changed his sign more frequently than is generally the custom; thus, besides the Helmet, he is known to have traded at the signs of the CRADLE, in Lombard Street; the HALF EAGLE AND KEY, in Gutter Lane; and the THREE ARROWS, in Golden Lane, near Cripplegate. There is still a stone carving of the helmet fixed in the front of a house in London Wall, with the date 1668 and the initials H. M. Ned Ward mentions the Helmet in Bishopsgate; he says at the battles without bloodshed of the Trainbands in Moorfields, the gallant warriors wish "For beer from the Helmet in Bishopsgate.

And why from the Helmet? Because that sign

Makes the liquor as welcome t' a soldier as wine."

Trades tokens are extant of the BLUE HELMET in Tower Street. From the same source we learn that there was, in the seventeenth century, a sign of the PLATE, i.e., the Breastplate, in Upper Shadwell; and a HANDGUN in Shadwell. This weapon was a sort of musket of early times, fired in the hand without a rest; "gunners with handguns or half-hakes" are named by Stow in his enumeration of the troops marching in the city watch on St John's night.

A few other old weapons remain to be mentioned, as the ARROW, once a great favourite when this weapon made the English name terrible whenever our troops took the field. In the last century there was a beer-house at Knockholt, in Kent, the sign an Arrow, with the following poetical effusion beneath:—

"Charles Collins liveth here,

Sells rum, brandy, gin, and beer;

I make this board a little wider,

To let you know I sell good cyder."

The CROSS-BULLETS, a name puzzling at first sight, was a sign in Thames Street in the seventeenth century, representing two bar-shot crossed, which the trades token elucidates by the equally puzzling legend, "at the Crose bvlets;" this was an instrument of destruction formerly used in naval engagements, and for that reason set up in the neighbourhood of the shipping.

If we may believe a jocular article on a quack handbill in the Spectator, No. 444, there was a CANNON-BALL in Drury Lane; for he mentions that—

"In Russell Court, over against the Canonball, at the Surgeons' Arms, in Drury Lane, is lately come from his travels a surgeon who has practised surgery and physie both by sea and land these twenty-four years. He (by the blessing) cures the Yellow Jaundice, Green sickness, Scurvey, Dropsy, Surfeits, Long sea voyages, Campaigns, and women's miscarriages, lyings in, etc., as some people that has been lamed these thirty years can testify; in short he cureth all diseases incident on man, women, or children."

Undoubtedly this bill had been slightly touched up in passing through the hands of the Spectator, who, like the mythological king, "quodcunque tetigit inaurat," for it is rather "too good to be true."

The HALBERT AND CROWN was, in 1791, the sign of Paul Savigne, a cutler in St Martin's Churchyard; whilst the SPEAR IN HAND is at the present day the sign of a public-house at Norwich, being undoubtedly a popular version of some family crest.

In Jews' Row, or Royal Hospital Row, Chelsea, there is a sign which greatly mystifies the maimed old heroes of the Peninsula and Waterloo, and many others besides; this is the SNOW-SHOES. It is the sign of a house of old standing, and was set up during the excitement of the American war of independence, when snow-shoes formed part of the equipment of the troops sent out to fight the battles of King George against "Mr Washington and his rebels."

One of the low public-houses that stood on the outskirts of London, towards Hyde Park Corner, at the end of the last century, was called the TRIUMPHAL CAR. There were a great many other houses of the same description in that neighbourhood, viz., the Hercules Pillars, the Red Lion, the Swan, the Golden Lion, the Horse-shoe, the Running Horse, the Barleymow, the White Horse, and the Half-moon, which two last have given names to two streets in Piccadilly. The sign of the Triumphal Car was in all probability bestowed upon the house in honour of the soldiers who used to visit it.

"These public-houses, about the middle of last century, were much visited on Sundays, but those contiguous to Hyde Park were chiefly resorted to by soldiers, particularly on review days, when there were long wooden seats fixed in the street before the houses for the accommodation of six or seven barbers, who were employed on field days in powdering those youths who were not adroit enough to dress each other's hair. Yet it was not unusual for twenty or thirty of the older soldiers to bestride a form in the open air, where each combed, soaped, powdered, and tied the hair of his comrade, and afterwards underwent the same operation himself." *

The grenadiers of Frederick the Great managed those things still better, for twenty or thirty of them used to sit in a circle, each dressing, plaiting, and powdering the pigtail of the man before him, so that all hands were employed at the same time, and none was lost in waiting. There is still a Triumphant Chariot public-house in Pembroke Mews, Chelsea, a house of more than fifty years' standing.

The BOMBAY GRAB in High Street, Bow, belongs to military signs, as "Grab," or "Crab," is a slang expression for a foot soldier; perhaps the landlord at one time may have been in the Bombay army.

Objects relating to the navy, or rather to shipping, are still more common in this seafaring nation of ours than the attributes or emblems of any other trade or profession. Ned Ward describes Deptford in 1703 as every house being distinguished by either the sign of the Ship, the Anchor, the Three Mariners, Boatswain and Call, or something relating to the sea.

"For as I suppose [says he] if they should hang up any other, the salt-water novices would be as much puzzled to know what the figure represented as the Irishman was, when he called the Globe the Golden Cabbage, and the Unicorn the White Horse with a barber's pole in his forehead." †

There is scarcely a town in the kingdom that has not a SHIP inn, tavern, or public-house. Tokens exist of "the Ship without Templebar, 1649," probably the inn granted in 1571 to Sir Christopher Hatton, along with some lands in Yorkshire and Dorsetshire, and the wardship of a minor. ‡ William Faithorne

* J. T. Smith's Antiquarian Ramble in the Streets of London, edited by Charles Mackay, 1846.

† Nicolas's Life and Times of Sir Christopher Hatton, p. 7.

‡ Ned Ward's Frolic to Horn Fair, 1703.

the engraver (ob. 1691) seems to have occupied the same house afterwards, for Walpole informs us that—

“Faithorne now set up in a new shop at the sign of the SHIP, next to the DRAKE, opposite to the Palsgrave Head, without Temple Bar, where he not only followed his art, but sold Italian, Dutch, and English prints, and worked for booksellers.”*

This sign of the Ship, next to the Drake, seems to have constituted a sort of a pun or a rebus on Admiral Drake, as observed by Mr Akerman. Among the trades tokens there was “Will Jonson at y^e DRAKE, Bell Yard, Temple Bar, 1667.” The Drake stood next to the Ship. It was doubtless a rebus, and alluded to the Admiral, who was very popular in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, the mint-mark of the martlet on her coins being termed by the vulgar a Drake. The situation of this sign near the Ship was appropriate enough. In the seventeenth century there was a sign of the Ship at Leeuwarden, in Friesland, (Netherlands,) with the following inscription :—

“Die in de ly, my vaart voorby
Zal hebben een Ryxdaalder en 't gelach vry.”†

At the Ship tavern in the Old Bailey, kept by Mr Thomas Amps, on Tuesday the 14th of February 1654, a plot against Cromwell was discovered. Carlyle‡ forcibly pictures the conspirators as eleven truculent, rather threadbare persons, sitting over small drink there on that Tuesday night, considering how the Protector might be assassinated. Poor broken Royalist men, payless old captains, and such like, with their steeple hats worn very brown, and jackboots slit, projecting there what they could not execute. The poor knaves were found guilty, but not worth hanging, and got off with being sent to the Tower for a while to ponder over their wickedness.

Names of famous men-of-war are often found on the sign-board, in seaports; either in honour of some brilliant feat performed by them, or simply in compliment to the crew, in the hopes of obtaining their liberal patronage. Thus the ALBION, the SAUCY AJAX, the CIRCE, and ARETHUSA, with innumerable others, may be met with in the vicinity of Plymouth, Portsmouth, and other seaports. The naming of signboards in this way was an old custom; as two examples among the London trades tokens very sufficiently prove. Thus, for instance, THE

* Walpole's Anecdotes of Painting, p. 132.

† “Whoever outsails me under the lee,
Shall have a dollar and drink scot-free.”

‡ Cromwell's Letters and Speeches.

SPEAKER'S FRIGATE, the sign of a shop in Shadwell in the seventeenth century. The frigate had been named after Sir Richard Stainer, speaker in the House of Commons in the time of the Commonwealth, who had done good service under command of Admiral Blake, in some of the naval engagements with the Spaniards. In 1652, this ship was sent to "Argier in Turkey," (Algiers,) under command of Captain Thorowgood, with the sum of £30,000 to redeem English captives from slavery. Upon this occasion the Puritan newspapers made the following punning prayer:—

"A prosperous gale attend his motion; and a Christian vote and blessing be present, in all their debates and consultations, for doubtless, 'tis a sacrifice pleasing both to God and man, and plainly denotes unto the people of England, that our magistrates had rather bring home exiles, than make more."*

After the Restoration the name of this ship was changed into the ROYAL CHARLES, (which also occurs as a sign,) that ill-fated ship taken by the Dutch in 1667, when, under Admiral de Ruyter, they made their descent on Chatham and Sheerness, and burnt a part of our fleet. The Royal Charles was one of the ships they took away. Its stern is still kept as a trophy in Rotterdam.

Ships occur in various conditions, as the FULL SHIP, Hull; SHIP IN DOCK, Dartmouth; and the SHIP ON LAUNCH, in every ship-building locality. The SHIP IN FULL SAIL was the sign of the first shop of Murray the publisher, in Fleet Street—probably in opposition to Longman, who had the SHIP AT ANCHOR. THE SHIP IN DISTRESS is a touching appeal to the good-natured wayfarer to assist in keeping the pump going. At Brighton, there was such a sign in the last century, on which the poet had assisted the painter to invoke the sympathy of the thirsty public:—

"With sorrows I am compass'd round,
Pray lend a hand, my ship's aground."

The Ship is to be met with in innumerable combinations: the SHIP AND PILOT BOAT, Narrow Quay, Bristol; the SHIP AND ANCHOR is not uncommon, and in one place, at Chipping Norton, it is quaintly corrupted into the SHEEP AND ANCHOR;† the SHIP AND WHALE, in compliment to the Greenland Fishery, occurs at

* Intelligencer, Jan. 27—Feb. 4, 1652.

† Unless it be another version of the Lamb and Anchor, see p. 300. Ship and Sheep, however, were formerly used promiscuously. Thus there is a token of William Eye "as the Sheep," in Rye, 1652, representing a ship, whilst Decker, in Mistrio-matrix, 1602, says, "and this shipskin cap shall be put off."

"On repairing it in 1752, in it was found a remarkably high-elbowed chair covered with purple cloth, and ornamented with gilt nails. An old fisherman told Mr Buckmaster that he had heard his grandfather say, that King Charles II. disguised, used on his water tours with his ladies to frequent the above tavern to play at chess, &c., and that the chair found, was the same as the king sat in. The chair was repaired and kept as a curiosity by the late John Dawson, Esq., but by neglect was, at the pulling down of his old dwelling at Vauxhall in 1777, destroyed. Mr Buckmaster sat in the chair many times, but his feet would not touch the ground. King Charles was very tall. No tavern of this name is known to exist now in Lambeth, but there is one of the sign of the THREE MERRY BOYS,* probably a corruption of the above name."†

In other places we meet with the THREE JOLLY SAILORS; at Castleford there used to be one representing the jolly sailors "with a sheet in the wind," and under it the following professional invitation:—

"Coil up your ropes and anchor here, Till better weather does appear."

In North Street, Hull, there is a sign of JACK ON A CRUISE, not on board H.M. ship, but "out on" what the lands folk call "a spree;" the cruises, however, are generally confined to rather low latitudes. The BOATSWAIN appears to have been a public-house in Wapping in the reign of Charles II., for Wycherly in the "Plain Dealer," 1676, makes Jerry Blackaire say:—"I should soon be picking up all our own mortgaged apostle spoons, bowls, and beakers, out of most of the ale-houses betwixt Hercules Pillars and the Boatswain in Wapping." The BOATSWAIN'S CALL is a public-house sign in Frederick Street, Portsea, whose invitation the sailors, no doubt, accept with much more pleasure than the boatswain's call of "all hands on deck" on a frosty winter morning. It was the name of a patriotic sea song during one of the wars with France. RED, WHITE, AND BLUE, and its synonyme, the THREE ADMIRALS, both occur in more than one instance in Liverpool.

The ANCHOR was, perhaps, set up rather as an emblem than as referring to its use in shipping. It is frequently represented in the catacombs, typifying the words of St Paul, who calls hope "the anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast." St Ambrose says, "it is this which keeps the Christian from being carried away by the storm of life." Other early writers use it as a symbol of true faith, and one of them has this beautiful idea:—

* Still in existence in Upper Fore Street, Lambeth.

† Thomas Allen's History of Lambeth, 1827, p. 367.

rine's Docks, and is still to be seen in Church Street, Mile End; the COBLE, a sort of fishing-boat, common in Northumberland; the TILTBOAT, Sommers Quay, Thames Street, in the XVIIth. century, and still at Billingsgate. This last was an open passengerboat for Greenwich, Woolwich, Gravesend, and other places down the river. It took twelve hours to perform the voyage to Gravesend, and much more if the wind was contrary, and the boat had not arrived before the tide turned. The tiltboats were superseded by steamers in 1815. The Dark House, Billingsgate, was their starting-place, and passengers would probably patronise the tavern with this name in the immediate neighbourhood, as they go now for a glass of ale and a sandwich to the RAILWAY, or STEAMBOAT INN, during the quarter of an hour preceding departure.

The FISHING SMACK was a public-house formerly standing near St Nicholas Church, Liverpool. The sign represented a man standing in a cart loaded with fish, and holding in his right hand what the artist intended to represent as a salmon. Underneath were the following lines:—

"This salmon has got a tail,
It's very like a whale;
It's a fish that's very merry;
They say it's catch'd at Derry;
It's a fish that's got a heart,
It's catch'd and put in Dugdale's cart."

This truly classic production of the Muse of the Mersey continued for several years to adorn the host's door, until a change in the occupant of the house induced a corresponding change of the sign, and the following lines took the place of the preceding:—

"The cart and salmon has stray'd away,
And left the fishing-boat to stay,
When boisterous winds do drive you back,
Come in and drink at the Fishing-Smack."*

The OLD BARGE was a sign in Bucklersbury: "When Walbrooke did lye open, barges were rowed out of the Thames, or towed up so farre; and therefore the place has ever since been called the Old Barge, of such a sign hanging out over the gate thereof."† The Old Barge, or the OLD BOAT, is still frequently seen as a sign on the banks of some of the canals through which boats and barges are towed.

The BOAT, an isolated tavern in the open fields, at the back of

* Hone's Every Day Book, vol. II.

† Stowe's Survey of London.

the Foundling Hospital, was the head-quarters of the rioters and incendiaries, who, excited by the injudicious zeal of Lord George Gordon, set London in a blaze during the "No Popery" riots in 1780.

NEXT BOAT BY PAUL'S, in Upper Thames Street, may be seen on the trades token of an ale-house, evidently kept by a waterman, who used to ply with his boat near St Paul's. The token of this house represents a boat containing three men, over it the legend, "Next Boat." "Next Oars" was the cry of the watermen waiting for a fare. Tom Brown in his walk round London, says, "I steered him down Blackfryars towards the Thames side till coming near the stairs, up started such a noisy multitude of grizzly old Tritons, hollowing and hooting out Next Oars and scullers, &c. And with that I bawled out as loud as a speaking trumpet, 'Next Oars,' and away ran Captain Caron, and hollowed to his man Ben to bring the boat near." "Next Boat," was also the sign of a public-house of note adjoining Holland's Leaguer in Blackfriars, where Holland Street is now.

The Law is very badly represented—the JUDGE'S HEAD seems to be the only sign in honour of this branch of the Commonwealth. It was the sign of Charles King, a bookseller in Westminster Hall in 1718,* and may be readily accounted for in that locality. It was also the first sign of Jacob Tonson, the well-known bookseller and secretary of the Kit-Kat Club, when he lived near Inner Temple gate, Fleet Street. In 1697 when he removed to Gray's Inn gate, he adopted the SHAKESPEARE'S HEAD, under which he became famous. After 1712, he took a shop in the Strand, opposite Catherine Street, but without altering his sign, and there he died in March 1736 possessed of a splendid fortune. This was that famous Tonson who published the works of the most celebrated authors and poets of the day. Dryden was one of them. Liberality in those days was a word not to be found in the dictionary of a publisher, as Dryden often experienced; in one of his ill tempers, when Tonson had been putting on the screw rather too much, the incensed poet began a satire upon him:—

"With leering look, bullfae'd, and freckled fair,
With two left legs, with Judas-colour'd hair,
And frowy pores that taint the ambient air."

These three lines he sent as a sample of his savoir faire to the publisher, with the gentle addition : "Tell the dog that he who wrote this can write more." Tonson did not wish to see more, however, and Dryden obtained what he desired. About the year 1720, Jacob Tonson left the business to his nephew, Jacob Tonson, jun., son of his brother Richard, who, through the patronage of the Duke of Newcastle, became stationer, bookbinder, and printer to the Public Board, and this lucrative appointment was enjoyed by the Tonson family, or their assignees, till the month of January 1800.

* Daily Courant, Dec. 17, 1718.

Lot Goodal, BEADLE of St Martin-in-the-Fields, in 1680, had, like other celebrities, taken his own goodly person for the sign of his house in Rupert Street, as appears from his advertisement, in which, like a true Dogberry, the public are informed that he had taken a silver watch with a studded case "in custody." The BROWN BILL was another constable's sign :—

"Which is the constable's house

At the sign of the Brown Bill!"

Blurt, Master Constable or the Spaniard's Nightwalk. Tho. Middleton. 1602.

This brown bill was a kind of battle-axe, or hatchet affixed to a long staff, used by constables. The name was transferred from the weapon to the men who carried it :—

"Const. Come, my brown bills, we'll roar, Bounce loud at the tavern door."—Ibid.

They were also called Billmen :—

"To us billmen relate,

Why you stagger so late,

And how you came drunk so soon."

John Lilly's Endymion. 1591.

Lawyers are only commemorated in the complimentary sign of the Good Lawyer,* and in the ROLLS, a tavern kept by Ralph Massie, in Chancery Lane, in the reign of Charles II. In various parts of the house, and particularly in the great room up stairs, the coats of arms of the Carew family spoke of its former possessors. Further back still, we have it as a timber tenement belonging to the knights of St John of Jerusalem, by whom it was sold to Cardinal Wolsey, who for a time inhabited it, before he had reached the summit of his pride and fame. Behind this building was the house and garden of Sir Walter Raleigh. But all these remnants of bygone glory were swept away in 1760, when the house was rebuilt, and the name changed into the

* See under HUMOROUS SIGNS.

a value of £20, which, in the pride of his victory, he set up as his sign. Upon this occasion, John Davis made the following epigram in his "Scourge of Folly :"—

"The Hand and Golden Pen, Clophonion
Sets on his sign, to shew, O proud, poor soul,
Both where he wonnes, and how the same he won,
From writers fair, though he writ ever foul;
But by that Hand, that Pen so borne has been,
From Place to Place, that for the last half Yeare,
It scarce a sen'night at a place is seen.
That Hand so plies the Pen, though ne'er the neare,
For when Men seek it, elsewhere it is sent,
Or there shut up, as for the Plague or Rent,
Without which stay, it never still could stand,
Because the Pen is for a Running Hand." *

The sign of the Hand and Pen was also used by the Fleet Street marriage-mongers, to denote "marriages performed without imposition."

Music-shops always adhered to the primitive custom of using the instruments they sold as their signs; for instance, the HARP AND HAUTBOY, the sign of John Walsh, "servant to his Majesty," in Catherine Street in the Strand, in 1700.† Other music-shops had the FRENCH HORN AND VIOLIN; the VIOLIN, HAUTBOY, AND GERMAN FLUTE; the HAUTBOY AND TWO FLUTES; all these instruments in the woodcut above the shopbill; which was a copy of the sign, are placed perpendicularly beside each other, without any attempt at grouping. The HAUTBOY was one of the most constant music-shop signs; it was formerly a favourite street instrument, and might be heard at the Christmas "waits," and on occasions of popular rejoicing. Waits even are said to have derived their name from it, that, according to one authority, being the old English name of the hautboy.‡ This, however, we believe to be a mistake. The Waits were "watches"—guêts, who went round at certain hours of the night with music, to let it be known they were on the look-out, and make people feel secure.

Novello, the well-known music publisher, still adheres to the old tradition, and carries on business in the Poultry under the

* The whole history of this calligraphic contest, written by Bale himself, is preserved amongst the Harl. MSS., No. 675.

† "Twelve Sonatas in two parts; the first part solos for a violin, a bass violin, viol and harpsichord; the second Preludes, Almands, Corants, Sarabands and Jigs, with the Spanish Folly. Dedicated to the Electress of Brandenburg by Archangelo Corelli; being his fifth and last opera, etc. Price 8 shillings, or each part single 5 shillings."—London Gazette, August 26-29, 1700. The use of the word opera here is somewhat peculiar.

‡ Hawkins's History of Music, vol. ii., p. 107.

sign of the GOLDEN CROTCHET. Somewhat similar was the SOL LA, or the MERRY SONG (le chant Gaillard) of Guyot or Guy Marchant, a bookseller and printer in Paris circa 1490. His colophon here represents the two notes sol la, surmounting two conjoined hands, in evident allusion to the words of the Pange Lingua "SOLA FIDES." At the side are represented two merry cobblers, a class of mechanics, who, from time immemorial, have been noted above all others for merriment, and a habit of singing whilst at their work. It is a curious fact, that on the title-page of one of the books printed by Marchant, the "Epistola de Insulis de novo repertis," his chant Gaillard is translated into "Campo Gaillardo," which seems to lead to the inference that this work had been printed by some one who had heard of Marchant's sign, but had never seen it, and merely adopted his name as being well known in the literary world,—a fraud frequently complained of by the old printers.

The FRENCH HORN was once a very common sign, and is still of frequent occurrence; thus, there is a FRENCH HORN AND ROSE in Wood Street, Cheapside; a FRENCH HORN AND HALF-MOON at Wandsworth; and a FRENCH HORN AND QUEEN'S HEAD in Smithfield. This last house was, for many years, kept by Peter Crawley, a noted member of the P. R., and there John Leech the artist, and a friend, used to study low life and boxiana under the tutelage of Black Sam. Finally, in the seventeenth century, there was a HORN AND THREE TUNS in Leadenhall Street. The trades tokens represent it as a French horn; but a drinking horn would certainly have been a more useful instrument in the company of three tuns. It was evidently a corruption of the Bottle-makers' arms, which were argent on a chevron sable, three bugle-horns of the first between three leather-bottles of the second. These leather-bottles might easily be mistaken for tuns, and the bugle-horn be modernised into a musical instrument.

This frequency of the Horn rather jars with the unpleasant signification that instrument had in seventeenth century slang. Among the Roxburghe Ballads (ii. 138) there is one entitled "The Extravagant Youth, or an Emblem of Prodigality," with a woodcut representing a youth jumping into the mouth of a large horn. On one side stands the father, seemingly in distress; on the other is a mad-house, with the sign of THE FOOL, two of the inmates looking out from behind the bars. The extravagant youth, after expatiating on his mad career, says:—

"But now all my glory is clearly decay'd,
And into the horn myself have betray'd.

All comforts now from us are flown,
My father in Bedlam makes his moan,
And I in the counter a prisoner thrown,
This Horn is a figure by which it is known."

The BUGLE HORN is fully as common ; it occurs on a trades token of 1667 as the sign of a house in Aldersgate Street, and is still to be seen on many inns by the roadside, where the mail coach, in the good old coaching time, used to announce its arrival by a cheerful tune from the guard's horn. Sometimes the HORN was used in a different sense. It was the sign and badge of the cattle doctor and village gelder, and came to be exhibited as such either from its use in drenching animals, or from the fact of such an instrument being blown by the doctor, to give notice to the villagers of his approach. At Messingham, Lincoln, the Horn Inn, a century ago, was kept by such a personage. Further on, at p. 369, this professional is mentioned in connexion with Tom of Bedlam.

The HARP, in the beginning of the eighteenth century, was the sign of a bird-fancier, "over against Somerset House in the Strand ;"* and is still used as the sign of many public-houses, generally denoting an Irish origin. The JEW'S HARP (an instrument formerly called jeu trompe, Jew's trump, i.e., toy trumpet) was in former times the sign of a house with bowery tea-gardens and thickly-foliated "snuggeries," in what was once Marylebone Park, near the top of Portland Place, but removed on the laying out of Regent's Park. Mr Onslow the Speaker used to go there in plain attire, and sitting in the chimney-corner, join in the humours of the customers, until, being recognised by the landlord one day, as he was riding in his golden coach to the House in state, he found, on going in the evening for his quiet pipe and glass, that his incognito was betrayed. This broke the charm, and like the fairies in the legend, he never more returned after that day. At the end of the last century there was another Jew's Harp Tavern [and Tea-gardens] in Islington. It consisted of a large upper room, ascended by a staircase on the outside for the accommodation of the company on ball nights, and in this room large parties dined. Facing the south front of the premises was a large semicircular enclosure, with boxes for tea and ale drinkers, guarded by deal-board soldiers, between every box, painted in proper colours. In the centre of this opening were tables and seats placed for the smokers; a trap-ball ground was on the eastern side of the house, whilst the western side served for a tennis court; there were also public and private skittle-grounds. We find a clue to this rather odd sign in Ben Jonson's play of the "Devil is an Ass," Act i., scene 1, from which it appears that it was formerly a custom to keep a fool in a tavern, who, for the edification of the customers, used to play on a Jew's harp, sitting on a joint-stool.

* London Gazette, December 20 to January 2, 1706.

One of the signs originally used exclusively by apothecaries was the MORTAR AND PESTLE, their well-known implements for pounding drugs. Among the celebrities who sold medicines under this emblem was the noted John Moore, "author of the celebrated Worm Powder," to whom Pope addressed some stanzas beginning:—

"How much, egregious Moore, are we Deceived by shows and forms;
Whate'er we think, whate'er we see,
All human kind are worms."

His shop was in St Lawrence Poultney Lane. Every week the newspapers contained advertisements proving, by the most wonderful cures, the efficacy of his powders.

In the sixteenth century a publican in Paris adopted the sign of the PESTLE, on account of his living in the Rue de la Mortellerie, (Mortar Street.) His house was in high repute amongst the gallants of the period, which procured him a visit from Master Villon, who thus describes it:—

"S'en vint en une hotellerie,
Rue de la Mortellerie.
Ou pend l'enseigne du Pestel,
A bon logis et bon hostel."*

VILLON, Franches Repues.

The Apothecary leads us to the Barber, or rather Barber-Surgeon, and the BARBER'S POLE, which dates from the time when barbers practised phlebotomy: the patient undergoing this

* "He came to an inn,
In the Rue de la Mortellerie,
Where the sign of the Pestle hangs out,
At which place there is good entertainment to be had."

This poet-swindler, Villon, used to go about with a few friends, who robbed and cheated landlords, and obtained good dinners without paying for them, whence he called them "Repues Franches." Too frequently he got off safe, but occasionally he would get a caning in the bargain to assist his digestion. These predatory dinners he has related in an épopée which has come down to us.

operation had to grasp the pole in order to make the blood flow more freely. This use of the pole is illustrated in more than one illuminated MS. As the pole was of course liable to be stained with blood, it was painted red; when not in use, barbers were in the habit of suspending it outside the door with the white linen swathing-bands twisted round it; this, in latter times, gave rise to the pole being painted red and white, or black and white, or even with red, white, and blue lines winding round it. It was stated by Lord Thurlow in the House of Peers, July 17, 1797, when he opposed the Surgeon's Incorporation Bill, that, "by a statute still in force, the barbers and surgeons were each to use a pole. The barbers were to have theirs blue and white striped, with no other appendage, but the surgeons [which were the same in other respects] were to have a gallipot and a red flag in addition, to denote the particular nature of their vocation."

Besides the well-known brass soap-basins appended to the pole, the barbers in former times used to have other and more repulsive signs of their profession:—

"His pole with pewter* basons hung,
Black, rotten teeth in order strung,
Rang'd cups that in the window stood,
Lined with red rags to look like blood,
Did well his threefold trade explain,
Who shaved, drew teeth, and breathed a vein."

In Constantinople, where the barber still acts as surgeon and dentist, the teeth drawn by him are worked in ornamental patterns intermixed with blue beads, and hung as trophies in the window. Some of our London dentists even yet follow this disgusting custom, for in no less a thoroughfare than Sloane Street there is a certain chemist-dentist who exhibits in his window a whole bottleful of decayed teeth. Instead of cups "lined with red rags to look like blood," the genuine article was formerly exhibited in the windows; but this was already prohibited at an early period, since the "Liber Albus" enjoins "that no barber be so bold or so daring as to put blood in their windows openly or in view of folks; but let them have it carried privily unto the Thames, under pain of paying two shillings unto the use of the Sheriffs."

* It is to be observed that these soap-basins are now always of brass, and also that on the continent their place is taken by a shallow brass basin to contain hot water.—Don Quixote's helmet of Mambrino, held under the chin of the person to be shaved, with a hollow space in the rim to fit the neck, and a cavity into which the soap is deposited during the operation.

As "a little learning is dangerous," the barber of the olden times generally contrived to make himself more or less ridiculous. Steele says:—"The particularity of this man [Don Saltero, see p. 95] put me into a deep thought whence it should proceed that of all the lower orders barbers should go further in hitting the ridiculous than any other set of men. Watermen brawl, cobblers sing: but why must a barber be for ever a politician, a musician, an anatomist, a poet, and a physician?" This love of music was at all times an idiosyncrasy of the knights of the brass basin. Morley, in his "Plain and Easie Introduction to Practicall Musicke," says:—"It should seem you came lately from a barber's shop, where you heard Gregory Walker or a Corranta plaide in the new proportions." Henry Bold, in the beginning of the seventeenth century, speaks of ancient tunes "still sung to Barbers' citterns, viz, the "Lady's Fall;" "John come kiss me now;" "Green Sleeves and Pudding Pies;" "The Punk's Delight," &c. And Tom Brown, in his "Amusements for the Meridian of London," remarks:—

"In a Barber's shop I saw a Beau so overladen with wig that there was no difference between his head and the wooden one that stood in the window. The fop it seems was newly come to his Estate, though not to the years of Discretion, and was singing the Song: 'Happy the child whose father is gone to the Devil;' and the Barber was all the while keeping time on his Cittern, for, you know, a Cittern and a Barber is as natural as milk to a calf, or the bears to be attended by a Bagpiper."

The cittern is also mentioned by Ned Ward:—"I would sooner hear an old barber sing 'Whittington's Bells' upon a cittern."

But enough of their musical parts; as for their learning no examples are wanting: Partridge, the classical scholar, in Fielding's "Tom Jones;" Vossius' barber, who used to comb his hair in iambs;* and Smollett's Hugh Strap, are excellent specimens. This last one was sketched from life; his real name was Hugh Hughson; he died in the parish of St Martin's-in-the-Field, at the advanced age of eighty-five, having kept a barber-shop in that locality upwards of forty years. His shop was hung round with

* Vossius, "De Poematum Cantu et viribus Rythmi," Oxford, 1673, p. 62. Isaac Vossius was an eccentric Dutchman, who died a canon of Windsor in 1639. In the above treatise on rhythm he says:—"I remember that more than once I have fallen into the hands of men of this sort who could imitate any measure of song in combing the hair, so as sometimes to express very intelligibly iambs, trochees, dactyls, &c., from whence there arose to me no small delight."

Latin quotations, and he would frequently point out to his customers the several scenes in "Roderick Random" pertaining to himself, which had their foundation, not in the Doctor's inventive fancy, but in truth and reality. The meeting at the barber-shop in Newcastle, the subsequent mistake at the inn, their arrival together in London, and the assistance they experienced from Strap's friends, were all facts. He is said to have left behind him an interleaved copy of "Roderick Random," showing how far we are indebted to the creative fancy of Doctor Smollett, and to what extent the incidents recorded were founded upon fact.

Not many years ago there was a hairdresser in the Rue Racine, who, probably on account of his proximity to the universities of the Collège de France and the Sorbonne, had this inscription on his window: "κείρω τάχιιστα καὶ σιῶω," "I shear quickly and am silent." This classical hairdresser was evidently acquainted with the answers given by Anaxagoras to a barber who asked him, "How do you wish to have your beard shaved?" and who received the laconic answer, "without talking." The shutters and windows of our Parisian worthy were covered with inscriptions in foreign languages, the number of which was only surpassed by the Bible shop in Brompton, during the time of the International Exhibition in 1862.

An eccentric barber opened a shop under the walls of the King's Bench Prison; the windows being broken when he entered the house, he mended them with paper, on which appeared, "Shave for a penny," with the usual invitation to customers; whilst on his door was scrawled the following rhymes:—

"Here lives Jemmie Wright,
Shaves almost as well as any man in England,
Almost—not quite."

Foote, who delighted in anything eccentric, saw this inscription, and hoping to extract some wit from the author, whom he justly concluded to be an odd character, he pulled off his hat, and thrusting his head through a paper pane into the shop, called out, "Is Jimmy Wright at home?" The barber immediately forced his own head through another pane into the street, and replied: "No, sir, he has just popt out."

Numerous more or less witty barbers' inscriptions are recorded; one of the best is that attributed to Dean Swift, penned by him for a barber, who at the same time kept a public house:—

"Rove not from pole to pole, but step in here, Where nought excels the shaving but the beer."

A variation often met is :—

"Rove not from pole to pole, but here turn in,
Where nought excels the shaving but the gin."

Sir Walter Scott in his "Fortunes of Nigel," vol. ii., as a motto to chap. iv., gives the following version :—

"Rove not from pole to pole—the man lives here,
Whose razor's only equal'd by his beer;
And where, in either sense, the Cockney-put,
May, if he pleases, get confounded cut."

The amalgamation of the two trades has led to some other rhymes and jokes. A barber-publican in Dudley has the following barbarous joke :—

"What do you think I'll shave you for nothing and give you some drink!"

The point of this joke lies in the punctuation, which the illiterate shavers coming to the shop are sure to treat with supreme contempt; but a barber in Ratcliffe Highway, circa 1825, had the following bond fide invitation :—

"Hair cut with despatch,
Shave well in a minute,
And a glass in the bar—gain
With a thimbleful in it."

* Note—Of gin and bitters, all for a penny ½d.
Come in, Jolly Tars, and be scraped across the line."

Another common inscription is the following :—"I tell U there is no shaving to X L——'s (name of the barber.) The Parisian barbers are much on a par with their English colleagues in brilliancy of wit and inventive power: "Ici on rajeunit,"† used to be a frequent inscription with them; others have :—

"La nature donne barbe et cheveux, Et moi je les coupe tous les deux."

or—

"A toutes les figures dédiant mes rasoirs,
Je nargue la critique des fidèles miroirs."‡

† "People made younger here," alluding to the youthful appearance of a man without a beard.

‡ "Nature gives beard and hair,
And I cut them both."

or—

"I devote my razors to all faces,
And can stand the test of the truest looking-glasses."

Tools belonging to various handicrafts are common public-house signs at the present day. The AXE is a very old sign; it was a well-known carriers' inn in Aldermanbury in the seventeenth century, and was one of the places visited in 1634 by that thirsty tourist, Drunken Barnaby. From this inn, the first regular line of stage waggons from London to Liverpool was established towards the middle of the seventeenth century. There were constantly some of them on the road, for they left every Monday and Thursday, and it took them ten days in summer, and as many as twelve in winter to perform the journey.

In 1642 there appeared "A Petition from the Towne and County of Leicester unto the King's most excellent Majestie," which was "printed for William Gay, and to be sold at his shop in Hosier Lane, at the signe of the Axe, July 29, 1642." When we consider that "the King's most excellent Majestie," was Charles I., we may come to the conclusion that there is something in a sign, as well as in a name; it was certainly an ominous and bad sign for the king. The CROSS AXES is a sign at Preston, Bolton, &c. The axe is also found combined with various other carpenter's tools, as the AXE AND SAW, Carlton, Newmarket; AXE AND COMPASSES in many places; AXE AND CLEAVER, in Boston, Yorkshire. Another sign, complimentary to the same class of workmen, was the TWO SAWYERS, which, at the end of the last century, was to be seen near the garden wall of the archiepiscopal palace at Lambeth; not unlikely, this was the same house, of which trades tokens are extant from the time of Charles II., when it was kept by John Raines, and its locality is described as the "New Plantation, Narrow Wall, Lambeth."

Signs referring to iron in its various states are very common on public-houses, as the smith is generally a good customer to them. Iron seems to have a dipsetic effect even in the bowels of the earth, if we may judge from the quantity of MINERS' ARMS in Staffordshire, Warwickshire, and the black country, in which latitudes teetotalism evidently has made but little progress; the DAVY LAMP is another sign intended to court the custom of miners, but being almost exclusively for workmen in coal pits, it only occurs in Northumberland. The FORGE, or the THREE FORGES, is common in the Midland iron districts. The CINDER-OVEN occurs in Norwich. The ANVIL, the ANVIL AND BLACK-SMITH, the ANVIL AND HAMMER, the SMITH AND SMITHY, &c., are all common about Sheffield. So are HAMMERS, combined with various instruments, as PINCERS, VICE, STITHY, &c. The Two SMITHS was a sign in the Minories in 1655; the trades tokens of the house represent two men working at the anvil. HOBNAILS is a sign in Dudley, that town having been famous for the manufacture of nails of every description, even as early as the time of Henry VIII., for the nails used in building the hall at Hampton Court came from there, and the original accounts preserved in the Public Record Office state that there was "Payde to Raynalde Warde, of Dudley, for 7350 of dubbyll tenpenny nayles inglys at 11s. the 1000."

The BAG OF NAILS was once a very common sign; there is one still remaining in Arabella Row, Pimlico. "About fifty years ago, the original sign might have been seen at the front of the house, which was a satyr of the woods, and a group of jolly dogs, ycleped Bacchanals. But the satyr having been painted with cloven feet, and painted black, it was by the common people called the DEVIL, while the Bacchanalians were transmuted by a comical process into a Bag of Nails."* This was, however, only an old slang name for the house, for, in the trial of Catlin, Patterson, and others, for conspiracy, one of the witnesses describing the place where the conspirators used to meet, says: "He went into a public-house, the sign of the DEVIL AND BAG OF NAILS, for so that gentry called it amongst themselves, (though it was the BLACKMOOR'S HEAD AND WOOLPACK,) by Buckingham Gate."†

A bona fide representation of a bag of nails was also used as a sign, as may be seen on the trades token of Henry Hurdam in Tuttle (Tothill) Street, Westminster, 1663, where the bag of nails is combined with a hammer crowned. And as it would be difficult to guess what the bag contained, and nobody cares to buy "a pig in a poke," the nails were sometimes represented protruding through it, as on the token of Samuel Hincks of Whitechapel, 1669. A somewhat similar sign is expressed in Rouen, Rue des Bons Enfants; it is carved in stone, and represents a bag with smith's tools protruding out of it.

Bakers and millers also are represented by a variety of signs. Beginning at the BUSHEL, a sign on the Bankside in the seventeenth century, and the SHOVEL AND SIEVE, the sign of a brush and turnery warehouse among the Bagford Bills, we next

* Tavern Anecdotes, 1825.

† Remarkable Trials, vol. II., p. 14. 1766.

accompany the corn to the mill, where we meet the DUSTY MILLER, a favourite sign in some parts of Yorkshire and Lancashire. A reminiscence of childhood may have suggested the epithet in this sign, for there is the well known nursery rhyme,

" Millery, Millery, Dusty poll,
How many sacks have you stole?"

The MILLSTONE may be seen at Stockport and Macclesfield.

The WINDMILL itself is a very old sign. It was a tavern in Lothbury, Old Jewry, frequented by fast men in the reigns of Elizabeth, James, and Charles I. Wellbred, in "Every Man in his Humour," (a play by Ben Jonson,) dates his letter to Edward Knowell from this house:—

" Why, Ned, I beseech thee, hast thou forsworn all thy friends in the Old Jewry, or doest thou think us all Jews that inhabit there," &c.

It is named amongst the list of inns "viewed" previous to the visit of Charles V. in 1522.

" Hugh Clapton, Mercer, mayor, in 1492, dwelt in this house and kept his Mayoralty there; it is now a tavern, and has to sign a Windmill. And thus much for this house, sometime a Jew's synagogue [in 1262,] since a house of friars, [fratres de penitentia Jesu or de Sacca, 1275,] then a nobleman's house, [Robert Fitz Walter, 1305,] after that a merchant's house, wherein Mayoralties have been kept, and now a wine taverne."—Stow.

The PEEL, i. e., the wooden shovel with a long handle used by bakers to place bread in the oven, was the sign of John Alder, in Leadenhall Street, 1668. Next comes the basket or PANYER, to bring bread round, which gave its name to "a passage out of Paternoster Row—called of such a sign Panyer Alley."* This is the highest spot in the City of London, as we are informed from an inscription under a stone figure of a boy sitting on a pannier, eating a very questionable bunch of grapes:

" When you have sought the City round,
Yet still this is the highest ground.

Aug. 26, 1688."

The Pannier was not an uncommon trade emblem. The BAKER AND BASKET is the sign of a public-house in Leman Street, and another in Worship Street. The claims to superior usefulness of the BAKER AND BREWER are held forth triumphantly to the advantage of the latter in some signs of this name. One, in Wash Lane, Birmingham, gives a pictorial representation of it; the baker's hand is resting on what is usually called the "Staff of Life,"—namely, a loaf of very respectable dimensions ; the brewer exhibits "with artful pride," a foaming tankard, when the following dialogue ensues :—

* Stow, p. 128.

"The Baker says, I've the Staff of Life,
And you're a silly elf ;
The Brewer replied, with artful pride,
Why, this is life itself."

The TWO BREWERS, or the TWO JOLLY BREWERS, used to be very common, but is now gradually becoming obsolete. It represented two brewers' men carrying a barrel of beer slung between them on a pole ; it was also frequently called the TWO DRAYMEN. In the bar of the QUEEN'S HEAD Tavern, Great Queen Street, is preserved a carved wooden sign, which formerly hung before this house, representing two men standing near a large tun. The DRAY AND HORSES, meaning of course the brewer's dray, has now in some instances superseded the Two Jolly Brewers. The STILL, the chief implement in the manufacture of spirits, is very appropriate before the houses where the produce of the still is sold : frequently it is combined with other objects.

The BOY AND BARREL, to be seen in Dagger Lane, London, and in many country places, is all that remains of the little Bacchus on a tun, formerly in almost every ale-house :—

"A little Punch-
Gut Bacchus dangle of a bunch,
Sits loftily enthron'd upon
What's called (in Miniature) a Tun."

Compleat Vintner. London, 1720, p. 86.

The BOY AND CUP at Norwich, in 1750, was a variation of this sign. Other brewers and distillers' measures also are exhibited, as the BARREL ; the PORTER BUTT, (three in Bath ;) the BRANDY CASKS, (three in Bristol ;) the RUM PUNCHEON, at Boston, Lincoln, and such like. Promises of fair dealing are held out in the sign of the FULL MEASURE, (four in Hull ;) the GOLDEN MEASURE, Lowgate, Hull ; and the FOAMING TANKARD ; or, an appeal is made to public joviality by such a sign as the PARTING POT, at Stamford, Lincoln.

Shoemakers generally follow the advice of the proverb, ne sutor ultra crepidam, and confine themselves to the sign of the LAST, which, for variety's sake, they paint red, blue, gold, &c. But since "cobblers and tinkers are the best ale drinkers," many ale-houses have adopted this sign also. A Crispin who keeps an ale-house near Liscard, Chester, has shown himself "tr last," by putting under his sign of a Wooden Shoe or L

"All day long I have sought good beer,
And, at the last, I have found it here."

The SHEARS was originally a tailor's sign, though 1 other trade emblems it had become common in the sev century.

"Snip, snap, quoth the tailor's shears;
Alas, poor Louse, beware thy ears."

This elegant little verse is quoted by Randle Holme, a to have been thought such a good joke, that a canny Sc buried in Paisley Abbey, had a pictorial representation his headstone. Charles Mackie, who wrote the histor Abbey, says it is an obliterated cross; more probably, it is a fleur de luce: this would also agree with the pronunciation of the name of the insect, which is ex same as the last part of that heraldic charge.

The HAND AND SHEARS, in Cloth Fair, Smithfield, 1 important part at the opening of Bartholomew Fair.
customary to make the proclamation for opening the fa the afternoon of August 23d, but the showmen and opened their booths early in the morning:—

"Lawful objections being made to this, a riotous assembly met before the day of the Mayor's Proclamation at the public-hot Cloth Fair, in which the Court of Piepoudre was held,* the 1
Shears—now transformed into a tall brick gin-palace—and at sallied forth, bearing along, in later years, the effigy of a woman sent Lady Holland, (who must have been instigator, and it would leader of the mob,) and the mob—knocking at doors, ringing bells ing and rioting, some five thousand strong, during three hours o dle of the night—proclaimed for itself, in its own way, that Ba Fair was open. The first irregular proclamation was for many y by a company of tailors, who met the night before the legal pr at the Hand and Shears, elected a chairman, and as the clock stri went out into Cloth Fair, each with a pair of shears in his hand.
man then proclaimed the Fair to the expectant mob, who all spe errand of riot, to arouse with the news of it the sleepers in the hood of Smithfield."†

The THREE CROWNED NEEDLES looks also like a tail and from the evidence of a trades token of 1669 we k it was the sign of a shop in Aldersgate. Hatton thin similar sign may have given its name to Threadneedle

* The court before which persons aggrieved in the Fair might have a "sp

† H. Morley, Memoirs of Bartholomew Fair, p. 237. See also Hone's Eye
Sept. 6, vol. 1.

(Three Needle Street.) Three Crowned Needles was a charge in the needle-makers' company's arms. It is a curious fact that all the needles used in England up to the time of Queen Elizabeth were of foreign make; those sold in Cheapside in the reign of Queen Mary were made by a Spanish negro, who carried the secret of their manufacture with him to the grave. In 1566 they were manufactured under the direction of a German, Elias Grause, and after that time only it seems that we had learned how to make them.

Among agricultural signs, the Plough leads the van, sometimes accompanied by the legend "Speed the Plough." Of two inscriptions on the sign of the Plough that have come under our observation, both contain sound advice. That of the Plough at Filey might well be remembered by "afternoon" farmers: it says:—

"He who by the Plough would thrive, Himself must either hold or drive;"

whilst on the Plough Inn, Alnwick, the following is cut in stone:—

"That which your father old
Hath purchased and left you to possess,
Do you dearly hold
To shew your worthiness. 1717."

In the inventory of church goods made at Holbeach, in Lincoln, at the time of the Reformation:—

Wm. Davy bought the sygne whereon the plowghe did stond for xvj^d.

This probably refers to the signs or badges exhibited by the religious guilds in the middle ages over the altars and as decorations in their churches, which were in some measure of the nature of other signs, in pointing out certain fraternities or trades, besides possessing a secondary and religious meaning.

The Plough and Horses is a sign at Branston, Lincoln. The Plough and Harrow is very common. Two doors west from the Harrow Inn lived Isaac Walton, about 1624, carrying on the business of "milliner and sempster," or what we should now call a linen-draper. He afterwards resided at a house in Chancery Lane, until he left London, for fear of having his morals corrupted—as he himself asserted. Goldsmith's tailor, who lived at the sign of the Harrow, has gained immortality by the bad taste of poor Goldy. On one occasion—

"Goldsmith strutted about, bragging of his dress, and, I believe, was seriously vain of it, for his mind was wonderfully prone to such impressions. 'Come, come,' said Garrick, 'talk no more of that, you are perhaps the worst—eh, eh.' Goldsmith was eagerly attempting to interrupt him, when Garrick went on, laughing ironically, 'Nay, you will always look like a gentleman, but I am talking of being well or ill drest.' 'Well, let me tell you,' said Goldsmith, 'when my tailor brought home my bloom-coloured coat, he said, "Sir, I have a favour to beg of you. When anybody asks you who made your clothes, be pleased to mention, John Filby, at the Harrow in Water Lane."' JOHNSON. 'Why, sir, that was because he knew the strange colour would attract crowds to gaze at it, and then they might hear of him, and see how well he could make a coat even of so absurd a colour.'*

Near Bagshot there is a public-house called the JOLLY FARMER, a corruption of the GOLDEN FARMER, a nickname obtained by one of the former possessors on account of his wealth, and his custom of paying his rent always in guineas, which—so says the legend—he obtained as a footpad on Bagshot Heath. That some such thing happened is evident from the Weekly Journal, March 29, 1718, where allusion is made to "Bagshot Heath, near the Gibbet where the Golden Farmer hanged in chains." The use of this word Jolly, on the signboard, formerly so common in our "Merry England," is now gradually dying away. Whatever be the opinion of our workmen upon the subject of national good humour, they no longer desire to be advertised as Jolly; it is vulgar, and they prefer Arms like their betters—hence those heraldic anomalies of the GRAZIERS' ARMS, the FARMERS' ARMS, the CHAFF-CUTTERS' ARMS, the PUDDLERS' ARMS, the PAVIORS' ARMS, and so forth.

The SHEPHERD AND SHEPHERDESS is one of those signs reminding us of—

"The tea-cup days of hoop and hood
And when the patch was worn."

calling up pictures of rouged shepherdesses with jaunty straw hats on the top of powdered hair a foot high, short quilted petticoats and high-heeled boots, courted in madrigals by shepherds dressed in the height of the elegance of the New Exchange gallants, with ribboned crooks and flowered-satin waistcoats. It was the sign of a pleasure resort in the City Road, Islington, much frequented in the eighteenth century for amusement, and by invalids for the pure, healthy, country air of Islington, which was then a charming village, more rural in the midst of its mea-

* Boswell's Life of Johnson, vol. ii., p. 63.

"Toebak that edel kruyt soveel daarvan getuygen Al die lang zyn gespeent beginnes weer te zuygem."*

On the GOUDSCHE MELKMEID in Amsterdam :—

"Goede Waar en goed bescheid
Krygt gy hier in de GOUDSCHE MELKMEID
Puyk van Verinas en Virginia Tabac
Kunt gy hier rooken op uw gemak."†

Another had :—

"Teckere Neusen, ecle baasen,
Die hy 't klinken van de glaasen
Tot het smoooken zyt bereyt;
Zoekje 't beste van den acker
Puyk verynis ! komt dan wacker
By de walsee mellik-meid."‡

HARVEST-HOME, the pleasant time of congratulation and feasting, must be an alluring sign for the villagers, calling up recollections of all the festivities yearly celebrated on that grand occasion, when—

"the harvest treasures all
Are gather'd in beyond the rage of storms,
Sure to the swain."—Thomson.

One of the misfortunes of the "ninium fortunati sua si bonanorint" is pictured in the CART OVERTHROWN, which is a public-house sign at Lower Edmonton; though how it came to be such is difficult to guess. On Highgate Hill there is an old roadside inn, the Fox and Crown, which displays on its front a fine gilt coat of arms with the following inscription underneath :—

6TH JULY 1837.

THIS COAT OF ARMS IS A GRANT FROM QUEEN VICTORIA, FOR SERVICES RENDERED TO HER MAJESTY
WHEN IN DANGER TRAVELLING
DOWN THIS HILL.

* "Tobacco is a noble weed, as many can testify.
Numbers of people who were long since weaned begin to suck again."

† "Here at the Milkmaid of Gouda
You will receive good articles and civil treatment,
Here you may smoke at your ease
Tip-top Varinas and Virginia tobacco."

‡ "Dainty noses, noble masters,
Who, by the jingling of the glasses,
Are prepared for a 'smoke';
If you look for the finest growth,
The best Varinas? Come then at once
To the Walloon Milkmaid," &c.

Earl of Rutland, "which was the first that was ever used in England." But in his larger Chronicle he says :—

"In the year 1564 Guiliam Boonen, a Dutchman, became the queen coachman, and was the first that brought the use of coaches into England. After a while divers great ladies, with as great jealousy of the queen's displeasure, made them coaches, and rid up and down the country in them to the great admiration of all the beholders, but then by little they grew usual among the nobility and others of sort, and within twenty years became a great trade of coachmaking."

Taylor the Water poet, who, as a waterman of course, bore grudge to coaches, said, "It is a doubtful question whether the devil brought tobacco into England in a coach, for both appeared at the same time." How common they became in a short time appears from all the satirists of that period; not only the nobility, but even the citizens could no longer do without them, after they were once introduced. Not forty years after their first appearance Pierce Pennyless, speaking of merchants' wives, says "She will not go unto the field to cove on the green grasse, but she must have a coach for her convoy."* No wonder, then, that according to the "Coach and Sedan," a pamphlet of 1636, they were then in London, the suburbs, and four miles' compass without, coaches to the number of 6000 and odd. These were nearly all private carriages, for the hackney coaches were only established in 1625 by one Captain Bailey. Their first stand was at the Maypole in the Strand. They numbered about twenty, and were attached to the principal inns. In 1636, the number of hackney coaches was confined to 50; in 1652, to 200; in 1654, to 300; in 1662, to 400; in 1694, to 700; in 1710, to 800; in 1771 to 1000; in 1802, to 1100; but in 1833 all limitation of number ceased. Besides cabs of various kinds, there are now above a thousand omnibusses regularly employed in the Metropolis, and the commissioners of stamps are authorised to license all such carriages without limitation as to number; the proprietor paying the duty of £5 for the licence, and 10s. per week during its continuance. What a difference just two centuries ago, when the proclamation of the "Merry Monarch :"—

"The excessive number of hackney coaches [about 400] and coach horses in London, are found to be a common nuisance to the public damage of our people, by reason of their rude and disorderly standing, and passing to and fro, in and about our cities and suburbs; the streets and highways being thereof pestered and much impassable, the pavement broken up, and the common passages obstructed and made dangerous." Hence orders are given, that "henceforth none shall stand in the street, but only within their coach-houses, stables, and yards."

* Pierce Pennyless, Supplication to the Devil, 1593.

At the Coach and Horses, Bartholomew Close, some vestiges of the ancient buildings of St Bartholomew's Hospital and Convent still remain—viz., a clustered column in the beer cellar, walls of immense thickness, and an early English window in the taproom, &c. This building occupies the site of the north cloister.* Another Coach and Horses, in Ray Street, Clerkenwell, is also built on classic ground, for it occupies the site of the once famous Hockley-in-the-Hole of bear-baiting memory. A comical ale-house keeper in Oswestry has travestied the sign of the Coach and Horses into the COACH AND DOGS.

The WHEEL, an object sometimes seen on signboards, may have been derived from the CATHERINE WHEEL, (the name of a favourite old coaching inn in Bishopsgate Street,) or from the wheel of fortune; the SADDLE and the SPUR are both very general on roadside inns, owing to the ancient mode of travelling on horseback; the WHIP occurs in Briggate, Leeds.

In Norwich there was (and we believe is still) a curious combination, the WHIP AND EGG, which existed in that locality as early as the year 1750,† and which is enumerated in London, under the name of the WHIP AND EGGSHELL, amongst the taverns in the black letter ballad of "London's Ordinarie, or Everie Man in his Humour," whilst a still earlier mention occurs in Mother Bunch's Merriment, (1604,) when the transformation of pigs into fowls, whereby one of the gulls was so "sweetly deceyved," is laid at the Whip and Eggshell. It has been explained as a corruption of the Whip and Nag, but the combination of these two would be so obvious that a corruption would scarcely be possible. In "Great Britain's Wonder, or London's Admiration," a ballad on the frost of 1685, when the Thames was frozen over, and a fair held upon it, the following lines occur:—

"In this same street, before the Temple made,‡
There seems to be a briek and lively trade,
When ev'ry booth hath such a cunning sign
As seldom hath been seen in former time;
The FLYING P—— POT is one of the same,
The WHIP AND EGGSHELL, and the BROOM by name."

The Whip and Egg, therefore, figured on the ice, and may have been brought together from the whipping of eggs, in making egg-

* These remains are engraved in Archer's Vestiges of Old London.

† Gentleman's Magazine, March 1842.

‡ A row of booths on the ice opposite the Temple.

punch, egg-flip, and similar beverages, much drunk on the ice in Holland ; and as there were always crowds of Dutchmen on the ice, whenever the river was frozen over, they may have introduced their favourite drink as well as their Dutch whirlings, whimsies and flying boats, and the sign have been invented in order to indicate the sale of those liquors.

The THREE JOLLY BUTCHERS used to be seen in the neighbourhood of markets and shambles, either in allusion to the three merry north-country butchers, who killed nine highwaymen according to the ballad, or simply that favourite combination of three which is of such frequent recurrence. The CLEAVER seems also to be in compliment to this profession, as well as the MARROWBONES AND CLEAVER. This last is a sign in Fetter Lane, originating from a custom, now rapidly dying away, of the butcher boys serenading newly married couples with these professional instruments. Formerly, the band would consist of four cleavers, each of a different tone, or, if complete, of eight, and by beating their marrowbones skilfully against these, they obtained a sort of music somewhat after the fashion of indifferent bell-ringing. When well performed, however, and heard from a proper distance it was not altogether unpleasant. A largesse of half-a-crown or a crown was generally expected for this delicate attention. The butchers of Clare market had the reputation of being the best performers. The last public appearance of this popular music was at the marriage of the Prince of Wales, when small bands of them perambulated the town, playing "God Save the Queen." This music was once so common that Tom Killigrew called it the national instrument of England. In 1759 a burlesque Ode on St Cecilia's day, written by Bonnell Thornton, was performed at Ranelagh. Amongst the instruments employed in this there was a band of marrowbones and cleavers, whose endeavours were admitted by the cognoscenti to have been "a complete success."

As the use of coaches gave rise to the sign of the Coach and Horses, so the Sedan produced some signs, as the SEDAN CHAIR Broad Quay, Bristol ; North Searle, Newark ; the TWO CHAIR MEN, &c., Warwick Street, Cockspur Street, and other parts of London ; and the THREE CHAIRS in the seventeenth century, a famous tavern in the Little Piazza, Covent Garden. The Sedan says Randle Holme, "is a thing in which sick and crazy persons are carried abroad, which is borne up by the staves by two lusty men."

* Randle Holme, book iii., ch. viii., p. 346.

The first sedan chair used in England was one that the Duke of Buckingham had received as a gift from Charles I., when Prince of Wales, on his return from that romantic "Jean-de-Paris" expedition to Spain.* The use of it got the Duke into trouble, and he was accused of "degrading Englishmen into slaves and beasts of burden." Lysons, in his "Magna Britannia," gives another origin for them; speaking of Duncombe at Battlesden, in Bedfordshire, he says:—

"It was to one of this family, Sir Saunders Duncombe, a gentleman pensioner to King James and Charles I., that we are indebted for the accommodation of the sedans or close chairs, the use of which was first introduced by him in this country in the year 1634, when he procured a patent which vested in him and his heirs the sole right of carrying persons up and down in them for a certain time."

Sir Saunders hereupon got forty or fifty sedans made, and sent them about town, but differences soon arose between the chairmen and the coachmen. Pamphlets were written,† ballads were sung on the occasion, and the public sided with one or the other, according to individual taste. A ballad in favour of the sedan said:—

"I love sedans, cause they do plod
And amble everywhere,
Which prancers are with leather shod,
And neere disturb the care.
Heigh downe, dery, dery, downe,
With the hackney coaches downe,
Their jumpings make
The pavement shake,
Their noyse doth mad the towne."‡

De Foe, in 1702, says, "We are carried to these places [coffee-houses] in chairs, which are here very cheap—a guinea a week, or a shilling per hour—and your chairmen serve you for porters to run on errands, as your gondoliers do at Venice." The chairmen of the aristocracy wore gaudy liveries and plumed hats, and their chairs were richly gilt and painted, and provided with velvet cushions. They used to be kept in the halls of their large mansions. As for the chairmen, we may infer from Gay's "Trivia" that they were an insolent set of fellows:—

* Dr Johnson's explanation that they received their name from the town of Sedan, whence they were introduced into England, is evidently a mistake—for the French copied them from us. See Tallemant des Reaux, "Contes et Historiettes," vol. vii., p. 102.

† Coach and Sedan pleasantly disputing for Place and Precedence, 4to, 1636.

‡ Roxburghe Ballads, vol. I., fol. 546, entitled "The Coaches Overthrow, or a joviall Exaltation of divers tradesmen and others for the suppression of troublesome Hackney Coaches."

"Let not the chairman with assuming stride
Press near the wall and rudely thrust thy side,
The laws have set him bounds; his servile feet
Should ne'er encroach where posts defend the street.
Yet, who the footman's arrogance can quell,
Whose flambeau gilds the sashes of Pall Mall,
When in long rank a train of torches flame,
To light the midnight visits of the dame."

The trumpet-like instruments in which these torches were extinguished, when arrived at their place of destination, are still seen attached to the area railing of most of the houses in Grosvenor and St James' Squares, and various other parts of the town fashionably inhabited at that period.

Another creature of this class, now as completely extinct as the Plesiosaurus and the Megatherion, or any other monster of the pre-Adamite world, was the RUNNING FOOTMAN. We cannot say that there is not a "sign" of him left, for there is one in Charles Street, Berkeley Square, representing a man in gaudy attire, running, with a long cane in his hand—under it, "I AM THE ONLY RUNNING FOOTMAN." This was a class of servants used by rich families in former days to run before the carriage, to clear the way, bear torches at night, pay turnpikes, and serving also in a great measure for pomp. Generally their livery was very rich, being somewhat of the Jockey dress, with a silk sash round the waist; sometimes, instead of breeches, they wore a sort of silk petticoat with a deep gold fringe. They carried long sticks with silver heads, which have now descended to their successors the footmen. The Duke of Queensberry was one of the last noblemen who kept running footmen. A good story is told of him in connexion with one of these servants. Whenever his grace wanted to engage one it was his custom to make him put on his livery and run up and down Piccadilly, whilst he, from his balcony, watched their paces; and so it happened on a time, that after one of those fellows had gone through all his evolutions and presented himself under the balcony, the Duke said: "That will do; you will suit me very well." "And so your livery does me," was the answer, and off the fellow went running like a deer and was never heard of afterwards. Another feat on record, somewhat more to the credit of the fraternity, was that one of them ran for a wager to Windsor against the Duke of Marlborough in a phaeton with four horses, and lost only by a short distance; but it cost the poor fellow his life, for he died very soon after. Most relating to them. The TALLOW CHANDLER, very common among the trades tokens, was always represented by a man dipping candles. To that trade also seems to belong the BOWLS AND CANDLE POLES, which occurs in the following rambling advertisement :—

“STOLEN,
Lost, or Mislaid,

A Promissory Note for one hundred and twenty Pounds, signed by John Smallwood and indorsed by John Addams. Whoever will bring the same note to the House known by the Bowls and Candlepoles in Duke Street, in the Park, Southwark, shall receive five Guineas Reward; and if offered to be paid away or any Writ to be taken out for payment of the said Note, pray stop it and the party, and you shall have the same Reward.

* * THE HOUSE is in Tenements, and some part thereof being a Pawn-broker's, was broke open and several things of value missing. Note, This mischief arrises from a country Butcher, who did strike and kick an old Gentleman at London Bridge, about three quarters of a year ago. And all persons who did see the said Assault and will speak the truth, (for Christ's sake,) are desired to send their Names and Place of Abode to the Bowls and Candlepoles and the favour shall be thankfully acknowledged.”*

The SCALES is a common sign referring to various trades : one of the engraved bill-heads in the Bagford Collection gives the HAND AND SCALES—viz., a hand holding a pair of scales; this antiquated mode of representing a hand issuing from the clouds to perform some action, has given name to a great many signs—all combinations of the hand with some other object. The SPINNING WHEEL was formerly much more common than now; there is still a public-house with this sign at Hamsterley near Darlington. The WOOLSACK was originally a wool-merchant's sign; it is often accompanied by the Black Boy. Machyn mentions this sign in 1555 : “The xx day of July was cared to the Toure in the morning erlee iiij men; on was the goodman of the Volsake with-owt Algatt.” It seems to have been one of the leading taverns in Ben Jonson's time, who often alludes to it in his plays; like the Dagger, it was famous for its pies.

“And see how the factors and prentices play there
False with their masters, and geld many a full pack,
To spend it in pies at the Dagger and the Woolpack.”

The Devil is an Ass, act i., sc. 1.

“Her Grace would have you eat no more Woolsack pies nor Dagger fury.”—Alchymist, act v., sc. 2.

In the year 1682, the Woolsack Tavern in Newgate Market attracted great attention, owing to a wonderful phenomenon used to meet at this house, exchange their bags and each return whence they came, thus effecting a considerable saving of time and trouble. Even washerwomen have been exalted to the sign-board, for in Norwich there was the sign of the THREE WASHER-WOMEN in 1750. And one of the implements of their trade, the GOLDEN MAID, (better known as "the Dolly,") may still be seen at a turner's shop in Dudley.

* Newspaper cutting of the year 1762, probably from the London Register.

A few others remain, which cannot, strictly speaking, be called professions, yet are they—or at least they were—means of making a living, as the THREE MORRIS-DANCERS, once a very common sign, but now, like the custom that gave rise to it, almost extinct. There is one still left, however, at Scarisbrook, Lancashire, and in a few villages a remnant of the dance is also kept up on certain occasions. They were called Morris, or Moors, from the Spanish Morisco. Black faces were required for the dance :—

"Nam faciem plerumque inficiunt fuligine et peregrinum vestium cultum assumunt, qui ludicris talibus indulgent ut Mauri esse videantur, aut e longius remota patria credantur advolasse atque insolens recreationis genus advenisse."*

There is a painted glass window at Betley, in Staffordshire, on which the characters performing the dance in the early part of the sixteenth century are represented; to these afterwards others were added. The earliest performers appear to have been called Robin Hood and Little John, Maid Marian, Friar Tuck, the May queen, the fool, the piper, and the plain rank and file of dancers variously dressed. To these afterwards were added a dragon, a hobby-horse, and other quaint types. Among the characters represented on the painted window are also a franklein, a churl, or peasant, and a nobleman. The hobby-horseman occupies the middle of the window, and is said to represent a Moorish king: he has two swords thrust into his cheeks, which seem to represent a feat of dexterity performed by Indian and Egyptian jugglers of throwing a somersault with two swords balanced on each side of the cheek. The horse (merely a frame covered with longappings, and only showing the neck and limbs of a horse, in which the man capered about) held a ladle in his mouth for collecting money.

The fool was one of the features of the pageant, and on him

* Junius' Etymologia: "For those that take part in these games, besmear their faces with soot and adopt outlandish garments, so that they may look like Moors, or as if they had come from distant countries, and thence had introduced this quaint amusement."

same grave with the "Spotted Boy," a natural phenomenon which had been one of his luckiest hits, and brought him a considerable amount of money.

It is curious to observe how the same simple thing mankind laugh for nearly thirty centuries, and that is the face. In our age a large proportion of the public seek an inexhaustible pleasure in pseudo-negroes, their songs and dances. The Greeks on their stage had a young satyr, dressed in a tiger-skin, with a short stick in his hand, a white head, his hair cut short, and a brown mask. This formed some antics, and was the prototype of the harlequin. The Romans adopted a somewhat similar character under the name of planipes, because he did not wear the tragic cloak; he also wore a variegated dress, for Apuleius, in his "Apuleia", speaks of the "mimus centunculus." From the Romans descended to the Italians, and as early as the sixteenth century we find the whole troop complete, playing in Spain, namely, Harlequin, Pantaloon, Pagliacico, the Doctor, &c. At a masquerade at the court of Charles IX., in 1572, the king represented the Devil; the Cardinal of Lorraine, Pantaloon; Catherine de' Medici, Columbine; and the Duke of Anjou, (afterwards Henry III.,) Harlequin. At that time, or shortly after, a troop of the Gelosi played the Italian pieces in Paris, and these characters were introduced.

For the sign of the GREEN MAN there is a twofold tradition. 1^o. That it represents the green, wild, or woodman, in shows and pageants, such as described by Machyn in his diary on Lord Mayor's Day, October 29, 1553:—"Then came the wodyn with ij grett clubes all in grene and with [squibs] bornyng . . . with gret berds and ryd her targets a-pon their bake." This green in which they were dressed consisted of green leaves. When Queen Elizabeth came to Kenilworth Castle, in 1575, "on the xx of Julee me the Forest as she came from hunting one clad like a green man all in ivie,"* who made a very neat speech to the queen in which he was kindly assisted by the echo. Besides the green sticks with crackers in pageants, these green men sometimes fought with each other, attacked castles and dragons, altogether a very favourite popular character with the people. One of their duties seems to have been to clear the

* Nicholl's Progresses of Queen Elizabeth, vol. 1., p. 494.

Follow the outlawed Earl of Huntingdon."

Richard, Earl of Huntingdon, 1601, (i.e.,

It was, in fact, the ordinary dress of foresters and is so still in Germany.

"All in a woodman's jacket he was clad,
Of Lincoln Green, belayed with silver lace."

SPENSER'S Faery

One of the most noted Green Man taverns is Stroud Green, Islington, formerly the residence Stapleton, of Gray's Court, Bart., whose initials, with his wife, and the date 1609, were to be seen on the wall. It was one of the suburban retreats frequented by the nobility in the days of Charles I., when it had been converted into a country house. A century ago the sign bore the following inscription:

"Ye are wellcome all To Stapleton Hall."

A club used to meet annually at this place, styling itself the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Corporation of Stroud. At Dulwich, in the reign of George II., there was an inn called the Green Man, a place of amusement for the Londoners during the summer season; it is enumerated, with other similar resorts, in the following stanza:—

"That Vauxhall and Ruckholt and Ranelagh too
And Hoxton and Sadlers both Old and New,
My Lord Cobham's Head and the Dulwich Green
May make as much pastime as ever they can."

Derry Down,

Musick in Good Time, a new B

The MERRY ANDREW was a card-maker's sign; in the collection there is a shopbill of the time of Queen Elizabeth, at Edward Hall, card-maker to her Majesty at the Mermaid in Piccadilly. The playing-cards at that time used to have a tain heads on the wrapper, according to which they were nominated. Merry Andrew was one of them. Other signs were the Great Mogul, Henry VII., Henry VIII., and the Savoy, (Prince Eugene;) second-class cards had the Hungaria, the Spaniard, the beau, and the Merry Andrew.

* Lewis's History of Islington, p. 281.

† Ruckholt was a reputed mansion of Queen Elizabeth, at Leyton, first opened to the public in 1742, it became a fashionable summer drive destination: public breakfasts, weekly concerts, and occasional oratorios amongst its attractions. The house was pulled down in 1745. Old as Wells relates to the well-known place in Islington, at that period Lord Cobham's Head has been noticed on p. 97.

a spear or a half pike, and a horn hung by his side from a belt or girdle cross his shoulders. Tom of Bedlam is in t with a long staff, and a Cow or Ox Horn by his side, but h more fantastic or ridiculous, for being a mad man he is mac dressed all over with Rubins, Feathers, cuttings of cloth : to make him seem a madman or one distracted, when he is dissembling knave."

"The Canting Academy," 1674, gives them a s and character:—

"Abram-men, otherwise called Tom of Bedlams; they are and antickly garbed, with several coloured ribands or tape i may be instead of a feather, a fox tail hanging down a lo ribands streaming and the like; yet for all their seeming have wit enough to steal as they go."*

Aubrey says:—

"Before the Civil Warre, I remember Tom o' Bedlams begging. They had been such as had been in Bedlam and t and come to some degree of soberness, and when they were out they had on their left arme an armilla of tinne (printe inches breadth, which was soldered on.)†

This permission, if ever it was granted, was retract Restoration, for in the year 1675 the London Gazette in several numbers the following advertisement:—

"WHEREAS several Vagrant Persons do wander about tl don and countries, pretending themselves to be Lt cure in the Hospitall of Bethlem, commonly called Bedla plates upon their arins and inscriptions thereon, These are that there is no such liberty given to any Patients kept i for their cure, neither is any such plate as a distinction or 1 any Lunatick during their being there or when discharged that the same is a false pretence to colour their wanderin and deceive the people to the dishonour of the Govern Hospital."

Not only men but also women of a roving disposit poor Tom's horn, and went wandering, begging, a under the name of BESS OF BEDLAM, which is still s in Oak Street, Norwich. Bess was an old compai Tom, for in the play of King Lear, Tom sings a snat with the words, "Come over the bourn, Bessy, to me commercial with the rest of the age, although we might wish they would force themselves a little less upon our attention. An undertaker recently hit upon what he deemed a brilliant mode of advertising his cheap funerals. He selected some good copy from the "Court Guide," and sent out hundreds of telegrams announcing the low prices at which a "body" could be interred, and reached their destination just as the lady or gentleman "was sitting down to dinner, others as the "parties" were going, or in the act of leaving home; but although the plan failed, the name of the undertaker and his prices were fixed in people's memories, and he received, instead of the numerous cautions not to telegraph in that way again.

* Canting Academy, second edition, 1674, as quoted in Malcolm's Customs," vol. i., p. 322.

† Lausdowne MS., No. 231 "Remains of Judaisme and Gentilisme.

An undertaker in Islington, some years ago, exhibited in his window some pleasing artistic efforts of his children, which have greatly comforted the father. "Master A., aged 12," had produced a grinning skeleton, garnished with wicker cross-bones; and "Miss B., aged 10," had painted in a section of a vault, with coffin heads, skulls, and sexton's tools neatly arranged right and left. The drawings were transparently glazed, and parental pride had placed them in the best of the windows.

petites maisons of the profligate French nobility in the times of the Régence. Stubbe, in his "Anatomy of Abuses," severely attacks them :—

"In the suburbs of the citie they have gardens either paled or walled round about very high, with their harbers and bowers fit for the purpose; and lest they might be espied in those open places, they have their banqueting houses, with galleries, turrets, and what not, therein sumptuously erected, wherein they may, and doubtless do, many of them, play the filthy persons."

The young Rake in Shakespeare's spurious play of the "London Prodigal," (1604,) says to the lady :—

"Now, God thank you, sweet lady, if you have any friend, or a garden-house where you may employ a poor gentleman as your friend, I am yours to command in all sweet service."

And Corisca in Massinger's "Bondsman," (Act i., sc. 3) :—

"And if need be I have a couch and banqueting-house in my orchard, where many a man of honour has not scorned to spend an afternoon."

He also alludes to it in the "City Madam." A remnant of this custom is still to be traced in a few country towns, (Sunderland for instance,) where the middle classes have little gardens, in the outskirts of the town, with bowers and wooden summer-houses for tea-drinkings. In Holland they still flourish; the family usually take tea in them, whilst paterfamilias placidly smokes his pipe and listens to the croaking of the frogs and the lowing of the cows in the flat meadows beyond.

The WELL AND BUCKET is a sign in Shoreditch, not badly chosen, as it intimates an inexhaustible supply; it is of very old standing in London, for it is mentioned in the "Paston Letters" in the year 1472.*

"I pray God send you all your desires and me my mewed goss-hawk in haste, or, rather than fail, a sear-hawk; there is a grocer dwelling right over against the WELL WITH TWO BUCKETS, a little from St Helen's Church, hath ever hawks to sell."

The anxiety about the bird, expressed in this letter, is most amusing :—"I ask no more good of you for all the services that I shall do you, while the world standeth, but a goss-hawk," is the commencement of the letter, which concludes :—

"Now, think on me, good lord, for if I have not an hawk I shall wax fat for default of labour, and dead for default of company by my troth."

In old times the ale-house windows were generally open, so that the company within might enjoy the fresh air, and see all

* Letter of John Paston to Sir John Paston, Sept. 21, 1472.

(St James' Street, 1699,) the BLUE AND GILT BALCONY, (Street, 1673.) Lamps have also, for two or three centuries done duty as signs, and continue still to act as 1 to those who want the assistance of the doctor, the cher the sweep. Ale and coffee-houses, too, are frequently de with gorgeous lamps : this was already the custom i Brown's time :—

"Every coffee-house is illuminated both without and within without by a fine Glass Lanthorn, and within by a woman so li splendid you may see through her without the help of a Perspecti

The Moorfield quacks had always lamps at their doors a with round glasses, having the same colours as the balls i signs, and this custom has been handed down to our day chemists, who still have circular, red, green, and yellow bi glasses in their lamps.

In Paris, in the sixteenth century, the pastry-cooks i nights to place a kind of lamp in their windows, which a magic lanterns. They were made of transparent paper, i with rudely-painted figures of men and animals. Regniat ions them in his eleventh satire :—

"Ressembloit transparent une lanterne vive,
Dont quelques patissiers amusent les enfans,
Où des oysons bridez, guenuches, elefans,
Chiens, chats, lièvres, renards, et mainte estrange besto
Courent l'une après l'autre."†

A Dutch grocer, in the seventeenth century, put up t of the BURNING LAMP, and wrote under it the followi tich :—

"Myn lampje brant uyt den Orienten, Ik verkoop oly, vygen en krenten."‡

The BRASS KNOCKER in the Great Gardens, Bristol, is sign taken from the exterior of the house ; also the FLOW which was very common in old London : one of the last ing stood at the corner of Bishopsgate and Leadenhall i It dated from an early period, and was, in the heyday fame, a celebrated coaching inn. The introduction of ra however, gave it a death-blow ; for some time it contri

* Tom Brown's Amusements for the Meridian of London, 1706.

† "It represented a burning lamp, such as some pastry-cooks have to amuse ren, on which geese, monkeys, elephants, dogs, cats, hares, foxes, and mar animals are to be seen running after each other."

‡ "My lamp is kept burning by the produce of the East.
Oil, figs, and currants sold here."

find a very substantial and tempting ROUND OF BEEF, with the following rhymes:—

“If you are hungry or a-dry,
Or your stomach out of order,
There's sure relief at the Round of Beef,
For both these two disorders.”

The roast beef of old England is further represented by THE RIBS OF BEEF, in Wensum Street, Norwich. THE FLANK OF BEEF at Spalding, the much less tempting COW ROAST at Hampstead, besides a couple of unpretending BEEF-STEAKS in Bath. Our bill of fare also contains plenty of mutton, sometimes rehaussé with a poetic sauce, as one that was at Hackney in the last century, THE SHOULDER OF MUTTON AND CAT, having the following rhymes:—

“Pray Puss, don't tear,
For the Mutton is so dear;
Pray Puss, don't claw,
For the Mutton yet is raw.”

The sign is still there, but the verses are gone. This suggested to another innkeeper on the common at Horsham, the sign of the DOG AND BACON. An epicurean publican at Yapton, Arundel, has a more gastronomic combination, viz.:—the SHOULDER OF MUTTON AND CUCUMBERS. It was at the SHOULDER OF MUTTON in Brecknock that Mrs Siddons, England's greatest tragic actress, was born, July 14, 1755. “Fancy,” writes an enthusiastic biographer, “the English Melpomene behind the bar of such a place!” Legs of Mutton on the signboard do not appear to be so common as Shoulders. But by far the finest of all the dishes represented on the signboard was the BOAR'S HEAD, in Eastcheap, for the character of the famous inn patronised by Jack Falstaff makes the association of an excellent dish much more natural than any heraldic origin. The first mention of this inn occurs in the testament of William Warden, in the reign of Richard II., who gave “all that tenement called the Boar's Head in Eastcheap,” to a college of priests, or chaplains, founded by Sir W. Walworth, the Lord Mayor, in the adjoining church of St Michael, Crooked Lane. The presence of “Prince Hal” in this house was no invention of Shakespeare; history records his pranks, how one night, with his two brothers, John and Thomas, he made such a riot that they had to be taken before the magistrate. No wonder, then, at the proud inscription on the sign, which still existed in Maitland's time:—“This is the chief tavern in London.” At one of the Londoners; the escort was routed, the pudding tal devoured, and the whole ceremony brought to an end, bef Austin had a chance to regale his customers.

Puddings seem to have been the forte of this Austin. or thirteen years before this last pudding, he had baked a wager, ten feet deep in the Thames, near Rotherhi enclosing it in a great tin pan, and that in a sack of lime taken up after about two hours and a half, and eaten wi relish, its only fault being that it was somewhat overdon bet was for more than £100. Austin was also noted fireworks.

The back windows of the Boar's Head looked out up burial-ground of St Michael's Church,* and there rested was mortal of one of the waiters of this tavern. His t Purbeck stone, had the following epitaph:—

"HERE LIETH THE BODYE of Robert Preston, late Drawer at t Head Tavern, Great Eastcheap, who departed this Life, March Domini, 1730, aged 27 years."

"Bacchus, to give the topeing world surprize,
Produc'd one sober son, and here he lies.
Tho' nurs'd among full Hogsheads, he defy'd
The charm of wine and ev'ry vice beside.
O Reader, if to Justice thou'rt inclin'd,
Keep Honest Preston daily in thy Mind.
He drew good wine, took care to fill his pots,
Had sundry virtues that outweighed his faults (sic)
You that on Bacchus have the like dependance,
Pray, copy Bob, in measure and attendance."†

Amongst other Boar's Head Inns, we may notice one in wark, the property of Sir John Falstolf of Caistor Cast folk, who died in 1460, and whose name Shakespeare : in the play. Then there was another one without Ald appears from the following curious document:—

"At St James's the v daye of September, an.

"A letter to the Lord Mayor of London, to give order forthw some of his officers do forthwith repaire to the Boreshed w^{hout} where the Lordes are enformed a lewde Playe, called 'A Sack Newse,' shall be plaid this daye, the Playeres whereof he is will prehende and to comitt to safe ward, untill he shall heare furtl hence, and to take their Playsbook from them, and to send t lithier.

"At West^r the vj daye of Sep. 1557."‡

* Also demolished to make room for the streets leading to London Bri

† Lansdowne MSS. No. 830, art. 73.

‡ Harleian MSS. No. 270.

The PIE was a sign in very early times, and gave its name to the Pie Corner, "a place so called from such a sign, sometimes an inn for receipt of travellers."—Stow, p. 139. One of the famous inns with that sign was the PIE in Aldgate.

"One ask'd a friend where Captain Shark did lye,
Why, sir, quoth he, at Aldgate at the Pye.
Away, quoth th' other, he lies not there, I know 't.
No, sayes the other, then he lies in 's throat."

Wits' Recreation, p. 185, vo

De Foe, in his "History of the Plague," tells of "a dread of fellows" who used to revel and roar nightly in that inn at the time the plague was at its height, but within a fortnight all of them were buried. The COCK AND PIE was once common. At an inn in Ipswich there used to be a rude representation of a cock perched on a pie, which was discovered whilst the inn was undergoing some repairs. It was also, about the middle of the last century, the sign of a house famed for conviviality, and was the resort of the "fancy" of those days. A row of cellars connected this house with another, noted for the manufacture of Bath buns and Tunbridge water-cakes, the latter of which is now almost obsolete, but which then was so fashionable that it was one of the London cries, being sold by a man on horseback. With regard to the origin of the sign COCK AND PIE, both the ancient Catholic oath, to swear by Cock and Pie (by God and the Pie, or Roman Catholic service book,) and the fable of the magpie (Old English pie, or pye) and the pea have each been duly considered by us; but the sign is probably only an abbreviation of the Peacock and Pie. In ancient times the peacock was a favourite dish, and was introduced on the table in a pie; the head, with gilt beak, being elevated above the crust, and the beautiful feathers of the tail expanded. As a dainty dish, then, it may have been put up with the other good things of this world, just mentioned, as a temptation to hungry or epicurean passers-by; at last the dish went out of fashion, the name even became a mystery, and was rendered obsolete by the sign-painters, according to their own understanding, who substituted COCK AND MAGPIE, which is still very common. There was a public-house with such a sign in Drury Lane, which was in existence more than two centuries ago, when the rest of Drury Lane was still occupied by farms and gardens, and the man monkey stands just opposite, assisting him in a way we need describe.

Drinkables are not frequent as signs, if we except such : RHENISH WINE HOUSE, and the CANARY HOUSE ; two tave Old London, named after the wines they sold. BARLEY BEE's-WING, and YORKSHIRE STINGO, are at present all three mon : the first applies either to whisky or beer ; the second the delicate crimson film left in bottles by old port wine Yorkshire stingo is the well-known name of a kind of ale.

a house with this name in the New Road, the first pair of don omnibuses were started, July 4, 1829, running to the and back : they were constructed to carry twenty-two passengers all inside ; the fare was one shilling, or sixpence for half the tance, together with the luxury of a newspaper. A Mr J. beer was the owner of these carriages, and the first conductors were the two sons of a British naval officer.

Drinking vessels are very appropriate ale-house signs. Among the oldest certainly ranks the BLACK JACK, common even in the present day, although the vessel that it represented is long fallen into disuse : it was a leather bottle, sometimes lined with silver or other metal, and perhaps took its name from a piece of the soldiers' armour. Sometimes it was ornamented with silver bells "to ring peales of drunkenness," in which case it was called a "gyngle boy."* This primitive bottle has been celebrated in one of the Roxburghe Ballads, (vol. iii., fol. 433 :)—

"God above that made all things,
The heaven, and earth, and all therein,
The ships that on the sea do swim
For to keepe the enemies out that none come in,
And let them all do what they can,
It is for the use and pains of man ;
And I wish in heaven his soul may dwell,
Who first devized the leather bottle."

Its various good qualities are next explained, and finally :—

"Then when this bottle doth grow old,
And will no longer good liquor hold,
Out of its side you may take a clout,
Will mend your shoes when they are worn out,
Else take it and hang it upon a pin,
It will serve to put odd trifles in,
As hinges, awls, and candle ends,
For young beginners must have such things."

* Decker's English Villanies Seven Times Pressed to Death.

1

2

3

4

5

the LEATHER BOTTLE is anything but an uncommon ale-house emblem at the present day. There is one still to be seen carved in wood, suspended in front of an old ale-house at the corner of Charles Street, Hatton Garden. In Germany, also, the leather bottle was once in use; drinking vessels of various materials, in the shape of a boot, are common in that country usually with this inscription :—

“ Wer sein Stiefel nit drincken kan,
Der ist führwahr kein Teutscher Man.”

The Black-jack Tavern, in Clare Market, still in existence, acquired some celebrity from being the favourite haunt of Miller, the reputed author of the famous Jest Book. The house was also for a long time known by the cant name of the Jun, which it had received from the fact of Jack Sheppard once escaping the clutches of Jonathan Wild's emissaries by jumping from a window into the street, and so making his escape. For the Leather Bottle to the GOLDEN BOTTLE is not so great a step as would appear at first sight, the golden bottle being simply the leather bottle gilt, as may be seen above the door of Messrs Hoare the bankers, in Fleet Street, a firm established for centuries under the same sign, although not always occupying the same premises. In the “Little London Directory for 1677” we find :—“James Hore at the Golden Bottle in Cheapside,” one of the goldsmiths that kept “running cashes.” In 1693 we find Mr Richard Hoare, a goldsmith, “at the Golden Bottle” in Cheapside, but in 1718 the house in Cheapside seems to have had a second occupant :—

“DROPT or taken from a Ladies' side on Tuesday, the 25th of March, coming from the Spanish ambassadour's at St James' Square, a watch and chain, with a seal to it, a pendulum* on the outside; Wind the maker. Whoever brings it to Mr Madding, Goldsmith at the Golden Bottle, the upper end of Cheapside, or to Jonathan Wilde, over against Duke of Grafton's Head in the Old Bailey, shall have 8 Guineas and questions asked.”—Daily Courant, April 5, 1718.

That the GOLDEN CAN was also an old sign may be concluded from a mention in the nursery rhyme :—

“ Little Brown Betty lived at the Golden Can,
Where she brewed good ale for gentlemen.
And gentlemen came every day,
Till little brown Betty she hopt away.”

Where the fact of little brown Betty brewing good ale points

* A face or dial-plate, sometimes also called pendulum dial.

multitudes that have it for their cognizance, in so much that it is painted over their doors by the wayside."*

The Pewter Pot, in Leadenhall Street, was a famous carriers' and coaching inn in 1681. There are also the SIX CANS, in High Holborn, (a sign evidently suggested by the THREE TUNS;) and, in the same locality, the SIX CANS AND PUNCHBOWL. This last object, the PUNCHBOWL, was introduced on the sign-board at the end of the seventeenth century, when punch became the fashionable drink; in one instance, at Penalnecy Kea, near Truro, we have the PUNCHBOWL AND LADLE, but most generally it is found in combination with other very heterogeneous objects. The reason of this is that punch, like music, had a sort of political prestige, and was the Whig drink, whilst the Tories adhered to sack, claret, and canary, connected in their memory with bygone things and times. Hence it followed that the punchbowl was added as a kind of party-badge to many of the Whig tavern signs, and hence such combinations as the following, all of which still survive at the present day:—

The CROWN AND PUNCHBOWL, Somersham, St Ives.

The MAGPIE AND PUNCHBOWL, Bishopsgate Within.

The ROSE AND PUNCHBOWL, Redman's Row, Stepney, and elsewhere.

The SHIP AND PUNCHBOWL, Wapping.

The RED LION AND PUNCHBOWL, St John's Street, Clerkenwell.

The UNION FLAG AND PUNCHBOWL, High Street, Wapping.

The DOG AND PUNCHBOWL, Lymm, Warrington, Cheshire.

The HALFMOON AND PUNCHBOWL, Buckle Street, Whitechapel.

The PARROT AND PUNCHBOWL, Aldringham, Suffolk.

The FOX AND PUNCHBOWL, Old Windsor, (perhaps meant for the great statesman, who was not disinclined to the beverage.)

The Two POTS is the sign of a public-house at Boxworth, St Ives, accompanied by the following verses, which are enough to set the teeth of a Bœotian on edge: how then must they shock the refined ears of the Cambridge dons?—

"Rest, traveller, rest; lo, Cooper's hand
Obedient brings two pots at thy command;
Rest, traveller, rest; and banish thoughts of care,
Drink to thy friends and recommend them here."

* What would old Randle Holme have said, had he seen the elegant (!) breast-pins displayed in the shop-windows of one of the principal West End jewellers, forming the tasteful device of a tobacco-pipe on a quart pot; another with a rebus for: "You are an artful heartful card;" and a third with: "O my eye!" and similar distinguished ornaments.

" Als gy dees Roemer ziet, gy kn
Maarkomt in, proeft zyn nat, d

And another one at the Hague had a caution to it on a double-sided sign

" Dees Roemer die gy ziet en kn
Komt in en proeft het nat het
Maar siet eens wat hier achter

On the other side :—

" Betaal eerst, eer je b
Of anders hoed of m

A near relative of the Rummer in St James' Street, Covent Gard actor. His drawer was "his old s has so often adorned both the theat and as he is a person altogether u it cannot be doubted but that he v same natural purity as he receives it (Brooke & Hillier.)—Estcourt's adv of the original Edition of the Spec occupation of Estcourt, Parnell allu poems :—

" Gay Bacchus liking E
A noble meal besp
And for the guests th
Brought Comus, L

This same Estcourt was sometime Club.

Finally, we may conclude this n
the signboard with the TANKARD occurrence. There is a public-hous which was formerly part of the ho field, one of the legal executors of H

The hanap or tankard was gene merly one of the most valuable pr in the Act 13 Edw. I., it says that house open after curfew he shall be

* " When you see this Rummer you m
But come in, and taste its liquor, y

† " This Rummer which you see here
Come in, and taste its liquor, you
But first, see what is written o

On the other side :—

" Pay before you go away,
Otherwise you will have to leave y on the signboard we must first of all notice that useful article the LOOKING GLASS, which was the favourite sign of the booksellers on London Bridge. Thus, one of John Bunyan's works, "The Saints' Triumph, or the Glory of Saints with Jesus Christ discovered in a Divine Ejaculation by J. B.," was printed by J. Millet for J. Blare, at the Looking Glass on London Bridge, in 1688. The French booksellers also used it : for instance, Nicholas Despréaux, or Dupré, a bookseller of the seventeenth century, who lived near the church of St Etienne du Mont, at Paris. Its origin was this :—Speculum, a looking-glass, was in the middle ages a common name for a certain class of books. We find, as early as 1332, a work entitled "Speculum Historiale in consuetudine Parisiensi;" then there is the "Grand Speculum Historiale," the great historical work of Vincent of Beauvais, one of the most celebrated books of the Middle Ages; "Speculum Humanæ Salvationis;" "Speculum Humanæ Vitæ;" "Speculum Vitæ Christæ," "a booke that is clepid the Myrrour of the blessed lyffe of our Lorde J'hu cryste;" the "Mirrouir of Magistrates;" "Le miroir de l'ame pécheresse," and innumerable other Speculums. These Speculums were amongst the first books that were printed; many of the early booksellers adopted the Bible as their sign, whilst others chose the Speculum, which they translated and made more fit for the signboard under the name of the LOOKING GLASS.

A curious fact is connected with this so common title of the Speculum for early religious books. When the first pioneers in the art of printing were pondering over their new invention, during the transition period from block-printing to printing with detached letters, Guttenberg, in 1436, entered into an agreement with John Riffe, Anthony Heilman, and Andrew Dreizeln, in which speculation the three associates were to furnish the necessary funds, whilst Guttenberg was to pay them one half of any profits, the other half being for himself. After a certain time the association broke up, differences arose about the liquidation, and a lawsuit was the consequence. The documents of this lawsuit are still in existence; from them it appears that they kept their invention a secret, and called themselves "Spiegelmakers," (makers of looking-glasses,) which looking-glasses, according to the evidence of witnesses, had found a very ready sale amongst the pilgrims who at that period congregated at Aix-la-Chapelle on the occasion of some religious

We now arrive at kitchen utensils: foremost amongst these rare the GRIDIRON, which was very common in the sixteenth century and may perhaps have been a jocular rendering of the Portcul. The FRYING PAN is still a constant ironmonger's sign—thus Highcross Street, Leicester, there is a gigantic gilt specimen with the inscription "the Family Fry Pan." There are trades tokens of "John Vere, at y^e Frying Pan in Islington, Mealman," which considered in connexion with pancakes, one can understand; but it certainly looks out of place at the door of Samuel Wadsworth bookseller at the GOLDEN FRYING PAN, in Leadenhall Street 1680. The COPPER POT (le Pot de Cuivre) at Dijon, in France was the sign of one of the oldest inns in that country. It was opened in 1250 and continued till the middle of the seventeenth century. The society of the Mère Folle held their meetings at this house.

The PEWTER PLATTER occurs both in France and in England it was famous as a carriers' inn in St John Street, Clerkenwell, 1681. At this inn Curll's translators, in pay, were lodged, and had to sleep three in a bed, and there "he and they were for ever at work to deceive the publick."* In mediæval Paris it was a common sign, and gave its name to several streets. Two of these inns victimised by that incorrigible scamp Villon, bore the sign:—

"Le cas advint au Plat d'estain Emprès saint Pierre-des-Arsis."†—Repus Franchcs.

Probably it was a very early sign for eating-houses.

The PUMP is a common ale-house sign, and occurs as such a token of Tooley Street, with the following lines:—

"The Pump runs cleer Wh. Ale and Beer."

which, as Mr Burn (Beaufoy Tokens) observes, may be a travesty of a verse in Histrion-Matrix, 1610:—

"Yet a verse may run cleare,
That is tapt out of Beere."

Another token belonging to Chick Lane, West Smithfield, represents a hand grasping the handle of a pump; and a publican, Old Swinford, who combines engineering with his trade, has a similar sign with the words, "Hands to the Pump." In t

* Lloyd's Evening Post, Jan 9-12, 1767.

† "It happened at the Pewter Platter, Near Saint Pierre des Arsia."

many others that could be mentioned. The GOLDEN KEY named in an old advertisement, speaking of some sports and pastimes which many English gentlemen are now attempting revive :—

“RICHARD FENNEY, Esquire of Alaxton in Leicestershire, about fortnight since, lost a lanner from that place; she has neither B nor Varvels; she is a white Hawk, and her long feathers and sarcel both in the blood. If any one give tidings thereof to Mr Lambert at GOLDEN KEY, in Fleet Street, they shall have 40 shillings for their pair —Mercurius Publicus, August 30 to September 6, 1660.

The LOCK AND KEY is a sign of a public-house in West Smithfield, and was, during the Commonwealth, that of a house in the parish of St Dunstan, belonging to Praise God Barebones, citizen and leather-seller of London. There is a MS. in the British Museum,* containing a petition of Barebones against Elisabeth and James Spight, the latter an infant under age, offered to the court of judicature for determination of differences touching houses burned or demolished by the fire of 1666. From the paper it appears that Elisabeth Spight paid £40 a year for the rent of the Lock and Key.

* Additional MSS., 5072.

customers would not care who made the hats; if good, and to the mind, they would buy, by whomsoever made. He struck that out also. A third said he thought that the words "for ready money" were useless, as it was not the custom of the place to sell on credit—every one who purchased expected to pay. These, too, were parted with, and the inscription then stood, "John Thompson sells Hats." "Sells Hats!" says his next friend; "why, who expects you to give them away? What, then, is the use of the word sells?" It was struck out, and HATS was all that remained attached to the name John Thompson. Even this inscription, brief as it was, was reduced ultimately to "John Thompson," with the figure of the hat above it.

THE HAT AND FEATHERS was almost equally common in those days, when no full-fledged gallant could be deemed complete without his fluttering ribbons and plume. The puritanical Phil Stubbe in his "Anatomic of Abuses," 1585, is very hard upon this fashion:—

"Another sort, (as phantasticall as the rest,) are content with no kind of hat, without a great bunch of feathers of divers and sondrie colours, peeing on top of their heades, not unlike (I dare not saie) cockes combes, but as Sternes of Pride and ensignes of vanitie and these fluttering sailes and feathered flagges of defiaunce to virtue, (for so they are,) are so advanced in Ailgnia [Anglia] that every child has the in his Hatte or Cappe. May get good living by deying and selling of them, and not a few proude themselves more than fooles in wearyng of them."

Decker calls the "swell" of his day "our feathered ostrich," and in his comedy of the "Sun's Darling" he mentions "some alde man's son wondrous giddy and light-headed, one that blew his patrimony away in feathers and tobacco." There is one sign of the HAT AND FEATHERS still in existence, a publican's, at Grantham, in Cambridgeshire.

Another old hatter's sign is the HAT AND BEAVER, which at present may be seen at the door of a publican's in Leicester. Shopbills of this once common sign occur amongst the Banl Collection, representing a beaver seated on the edge of a stream with a hat above him. The relation between the two is evident and about as gratifying to the beaver as it was to the widow who hanged man to hear the gallows named. The beaver hat was worn in England at the time of Edward III., and long afterwards were made in Flanders and Picardy. From the Privy Purse expenses of Henry VIII. we see that the king paid in 1532:—

in the year 1597. The sign of the CAP AND STOCKING, still Leicester, commemorates the once-flourishing trade of that town in those articles. The quantity of workmen who found occupations in the manufacture of the above-named "statute cap" (which came chiefly from Leicestershire and the surrounding districts,) was one of the principal reasons why it was so often protected by parliamentary statutes. Fuller enumerates not less than fifteen callings, "besides other exercises," all employed the trade of capmaking, beginning with the woolcarder, and ending with the bandmaker. The HAT AND STAR, which occurs in the bill of Master Bates in St Paul's Churchyard, who sold all sorts of fine "caines, whippes, spurres,"* &c., if not a simple quartering of two signs, possibly originated in the clasp ornament of precious stones, formerly worn in the hat. The LEGHORN HAT, at the end of the last century, was generally a turner's sign because the members of that trade sold straw hats imported from Leghorn. In St John Street, Clerkenwell, there was an established public-house, and place of resort, called the THREE HATS. It is mentioned by Bickerstaff in his comedy of "The Hypocrite," where Mawworm thus alludes to it:—

"Till I went after him, [Dr Cantwell,] I was little better than the devil; my conscience was tanned with sin, like a piece of neat's leather, and I had no more feeling than the sole of my shoe; always a roving after fantastical delights; I used to go every Sunday evening to the Three Hats at Islington; it's a public-house . . . mayhap your Ladyship may know it. I was a great lover of skittles, too, but now I cannot bear them."

At this house the earliest prototypes of Astley used to perform in 1758. There was Thomas, an Irishman, surnamed Tartar; then came Johnson, Sampson, Price, and Cunningham. The great Johnson went here to see his namesake.

"Such a man, sir, said he, should be encouraged; for his performance shows the extent of human powers in one instance, and thus tend to raise our opinion of the faculties of man. He shows what may be obtained by persevering application; so that every man may hope, by giving as much application, although, perhaps, he may never ride three horses at a time or dance upon a wire, yet he may be equally expert in whatever profession he has chosen to pursue."

Royalty also visited the place: "Yesterday his Royal Highness the Duke of York was at the Three Hats, Islington, to see the extraordinary feats of horsemanship exhibited there. There were near five hundred spectators."† Sampson's wife was the first female equestrian.

* Bagford Bills.

† British Chronicle, July 17, 1766.

the cavalier. For this reason, Decker advises the young cavalier Gull :—

"Thy hair, whose length before the rigorous edge of any puritanical of scissors should shorten the breadth of a finger, let the three-house wigmakers of Destiny rather curtail the thread of thy life. Oh, no ! hair is the only net that women spread abroad to entrap man in, and should not men be as far above women in that commodity as they go far beyond them in others." *

The PERIWIG was another common hairdresser's sign. Even had to submit to the favourite blue colour, for amongst the Barber's bills there is one of John Thompson, in Brewer Street, Golden Square, who lived at the BLUE PERUKE AND STAR. This was evidently the original sign, to which the wig had been added on account of the profession of the occupant of the house.

The WHITE PERUKE, in Maiden Lane, was the sign of a barber, at whose lodgings Voltaire lived when on a visit to London ; some of his letters to Swift are dated from that place. The white periwig was a highly fashionable object :—"Now, I think he looks very humorous and agreeable ; I vow, in a white periwig he might do mischief ; could he but talk and take snuff, they never a fop in town would go beyond him."—Cibber's Don Quixote, 1707. So Shadwell, in "The Humourist," 1671, describes Brisk, one of the dramatis personæ, as "a fellow that never wore a noble and polite garniture, or a white periwig." Well might barbers give the peruke the honour of this signboard, for the profits on that article must have been enormous. In Charles I's time, for instance, a fine peruke cost as much as £50 ; and he the great respect Cibber paid to the one he wore in the character of Sir Fopling Flutter, which was brought on the stage in a sedan chair and put on before the public. As the glory of Miltiades prevented Epaminondas from sleeping, so the beauty of this periwig disturbed the slumbers of Mr (afterwards Colonel) Brett, who the end bought it from Cibber.† The thieves as well as beaux knew the value of those wigs, and practised all manner of tricks to obtain them. Sometimes a boy, carried in a basket on the shoulders of a man, would snatch the "curly honour" off the head of the unsuspecting beau ; ‡ at other times they would dig holes in the leather backs of the coaches, § whilst the highwaymen were sure to include the periwig with the rest of the booty captured on the road. Though this article is now shorn of

* Decker's Gull's Hornbook.

‡ Gay's Trivia, book iii.

† Cibber's Apology, p. 303.

§ Weekly Journal, March 30, 1717.

found people who believed her, and gave their attention to this phenomenon. Amongst them were Sir Richard Manningham, Dr St André, surgeon and anatomist to his Majesty, Dr Mowbray, &c. By these gentlemen she was brought to Lacy's Bagnio, and the case was watched with intense interest; yet she succeeded in baffling and deluding their attention. At last the fraud came out by one of her accomplices informing upon her. Prints, books, and ballads were published upon the subject, Dr St André coming in for an extra share of ridicule; but whether the woman was in any way punished, is not on record. The last information respecting her was in the Weekly Miscellany, April 19, 1740:—"The celebrated rabbit-woman, of Godalmin, in Surrey, was committed to Guilford gaol for receiving stolen goods." She died in January 1763.

The PEARL OF VENICE is named in an advertisement of a watch lost, "made at Paris, not so broad as a shilling, in a case of black leather with gold nails."* It was the sign of "M^r Leroy, in St James' Street, Covent Garding." The pearls of Venice were celebrated:—

"Is your pearl orient, sir?

Corr. Venice was never owner of the like."

—BEN JONSON, The Fox, a. i., s. i.

At the same time that city was celebrated for its mock jewellery and glass imitations.

From the Bagford shopbills, it appears that the BLUE BODICE was, in Queen Anne's reign, a milliner's shop in the Long Walk, near Christchurch Hospital. At the same period another member of the same fraternity (there were men-milliners in those days) had the HOOD AND SCARF, articles of female apparel; this shop was in Cornhill, "over against Wills' Coffee-house."† At the present time there is in the North a public-house called the BLUE STOOPS; this also seems to refer to an ancient garment, worn in the beginning of the seventeenth century, and named by Ben Jonson—"Alchymist," a. iv., s. ii.—"Your Spanish stoop is the best garment."

The BONNY CRAVAT, at Woodchurch, Tenterden, to judge from the adjective, seems rather to have been suggested by the old song of "Jenny, come tie my bonny cravat," than by the introduction of the cravat as an article of dress. The fashion is

* Mercurius Publicus, Jan. 8 to 15, 1662.

† London Gazette, March 12 to 16, 1673. This was not the famous Will's Coffee-house, which was situated in Bow Street, Covent Garden.

to John de Tymberhutte, and 3s. to the Prior and convent of St Mary Overie, in Southwark ; value clear, 40s.

It is a fact on record that Henry Bayley, the hosteller of the Tabard, was one of the burgesses who represented the borough of Southwark in the Parliament held in Westminster in the 50th Edw. III., (1376 :) and he was again returned to the Parliament held at Gloucester in the 2d Richard II., in 1378.* The tavern itself is named, at the very period when Chaucer's poem is supposed to have been written, in one of the rolls of Parliament, where, 5th Richard II., (1381,) in a list of malefactors who had participated in the rebellion of Jack Cade, occurs the name of "Joh'es Brewersman, manens apud le Tabbard, London." Stow thus notices the old inn :—

"From thence to London, on the same side, be many fair inns for receipt of travellers, by their signs—the SPURRE, CHRISTOPHER, BULL, QUEEN'S HEAD, TABARDE, GEORGE, HART, KING'S HEAD, &c. Amongst the which the most ancient is the Tabard ; so called of the sign, which, as we now term it, is a jacket or sleeveless coat, whole before, open on both sides, with a square collar, winged at the shoulders, a stately garment of old time, commonly worn of noblemen and others, both at home and abroad in the wars, but then, (to wit, in the wars,) their arms embroidered or otherwise depict upon them, that any man by his coat of arms might be known from others ; but now these tabardes are only worn by the heralds, and be called their coate of armes in service."—Stow, p. 154.

Formerly there stood in the road, in front of the Tabard, a beam laid crosswise upon two uprights, upon which was the following inscription :—"This is the Inne where Sir Jeffrey Chaucer and the nine-and-twenty pilgrims lay in their journey to Canterbury, anno 1583." Over this the sign was hung, but that disappeared with the rest of them in 1766. The writing of this inscription seemed ancient, yet Tyrwhitt is of opinion that it was not older than the seventeenth century, since Speght, who describes the Tabard in his edition of Chaucer 1602, does not mention it. Perhaps it was put up after the fire of 1676, when the Tabard changed its name into the TALBOT.

At the present day the inn is known by the name of the Talbot ; and although the building is by no means the same that sheltered Chaucer and his merry pilgrims, yet it is full of traditional lore concerning them. In the centre of the gallery there was a picture, said to be by Blake, and well painted, representing the Canterbury Pilgrimage, almost invisible from dirt, age, and smoke. Behind this picture was a door opening into a lofty pasleathers and edges of the shoe laced in orderly courses with narrow galloon lace of any colour;" this places the use of laced boots much earlier than we would have been apt to imagine. The CLOG is often used as a shoemaker's sign in Lancashire and the midland counties, and also in those parts of London where that article is worn. The FIVE CLOGS was, in 1718, the sign of William Wright, a quack, who lived over against Prescott Street Goodman's Fields.* Perhaps he occupied apartments at a clog maker's. Even the primitive WOODEN SHOE (sabot) of France has figured as a tavern sign in that country. In a farce of the fourteenth century, entitled, "Pernet qui va au Vin," the husband names the following taverns:—

* G. A. Corner, on the Inns of Southwark.

"Au Sabot ou à la Lanterne
J'ai mis en oubli la taverne."

Ronsard addressed some of his verses to the hostess of this tavern, which was situated in the Faubourg St Marcel:—

"Je ne suis point, ma guerrière Cassandre, Ni Mirmidon, ni Dolope soudard."

"Il n'y a personne," says Furetière in his Roman Bourgeois, "qui ne se figure qu'on parle d'une Pentasilée ou d'une Talestris; cependant cette guerrière Cassandre n'était réellement qu'une grande hallebreda qui tenait le cabaret du Sabot dans le faubourg Saint Marcel."†

This sign has given its name to a street in Paris.

The PATTEN, the quaint little contrivance in which our great grandmothers tripped through the winter's sludge, was the sign of a toy-shop in the Haymarket, "over against Great Suffolk Street, and by Pall Mall;"‡ at the present day it is still extant as a fishmonger's shop in Whitecross Street, near the prison.

The very common sign of the STAR AND GARTER refers to the insignia of the Order of the Garter. Anciently it was simply called the GARTER, and thus it is designated by Shakespeare in his "Merry Wives of Windsor." Charles I. added the star to the insignia, and his example was followed on the sign board. At that time the Garter was treated with a great deal more respect than at present, for Sandford, Lancaster Herald in 1686, complained that several coffee-houses had the sign of the

* Weekly Journal, Jan. 4, 1718.

† "I am, my warlike Cassandra,

Neither a Myrmidon nor a Dolopian warrior."

"Everybody that reads those lines," says Furetière in his Roman Bourgeois, "will certainly imagine that he alludes to some Pentasilée or Talestris; yet this warlike Cassandra was after all neither more nor less than a tall manly looking wench who kept the Wooden Shoe (Sabot) public-house in the Faubourg Saint Marcel."

‡ Bagford Bills.

rural bridegroom in the time of Queen Elizabeth wore gloves on his hat as a sign of good husbandry ; noblemen wore their ladies' gloves in front of their hats ; in some parts of England it used to be the custom to hang a pair of white gloves on the pew of unmarried villagers, who had died in the flower of their youth ; it is used in marriage by proxy, and is connected with innumerable other customs and ceremonies.

The FAN, the CROWNED FAN, the Two FANS, &c., were the ordinary signs of milliners who sold fans.

The PINCUSHION is the sign of a public-house at Wyberton, Boston, but why chosen it is difficult to say ; and the PURSE occurs amongst the trades tokens of W. Smithfield, with the date 1669. This last object was also the sign of one of the taverns visited at Barnet by Drunken Barnaby, where he had the misfortune with the bears.

The RING was the sign of one of the booksellers in Little Britain, in the reign of Queen Anne ; and the GOLDEN RING was, in 1723, the sign of G. Coniers on Ludgate Hill, who published a black letter edition of "The Merry Tales of the Mad Men of Gotham." An old tradition that Gutenberg received the first idea of printing from the seal of his ring impressed in wax, may have led those booksellers to adopt that object for their sign.

"Respicit archetypos auri vestigia lustrans,

Et secum tacitus talia verba refert :

Quam belle pandit certas hæc orbita voces,

*Monstrat et exactis apta reperta libris."

A red or a bipartite UMBRELLA or PARASOL is the invariable sign of the umbrella-maker. This now indispensable article was brought into fashion by Hanway the philanthropist, towards the end of the eighteenth century. Before his time, a cloak was the only protection against a shower. Pepys writes in his Diary "This day in the afternoon, stepping with the Duke of York in to St James' Park, it rained, and I was forced to lend the duke my cloak, which he wore through the park." On another occasion Pepys was out with no less than four ladies, "and it rained all the way, it troubled us ; but, however, my cloak kept us all dry." Pepys sheltering the four ladies under his cloak of charity would make a very pretty picture. In the reign of Queen Anne, good housewives defied the winter's shower

* "He looked intently at the seal, observing the impression left by the gold, and spoke these words to himself, 'How beautifully and distinctly does this impression render the words,' and he proved his useful discovery in exact books."

CHAPTER XIII

GEOGRAPHY AND TOPOGRAPHY.

FOREMOST in this division stands the GLOBE,—"the great Globe itself," a trade emblem common to publicans, outfitters, and others, who rely upon cosmopolitan customers. One of the theatres, where Shakespeare used to perform, was called The Globe, from its sign representing Atlas supporting the world. It was accompanied by the motto, TOTUS MUNDUS AGIT HISTORIONEM; upon which Ben Jonson made the following epigram:—

"If but stage actors all the world displays,
Where shall we find spectators to their plays!"

To which Shakespeare is said to have returned this answer:—

"Little or much of what we see we do,
We are all actors and spectators too."

The house stood on the Bankside, Southwark, and was burnt down in June 1613, having been set on fire during one of the plays by a piece of wadding fired from a cannon falling on the thatched roof. It was rebuilt, but finally taken down in 1644 to make room for dwelling-houses.

One of the most famous Globe taverns stood, till the beginning of this century, in Fleet Street. It had been one of the favourite haunts of Oliver Goldsmith, who, it appears, was never tired of hearing a certain "tun of a man" sing "Nottingham Ale." Goldsmith's face was so well known here that a wealthy pork-butcher, another habitué of the house, used to drink to him in the familiar words, "Come, Noll, old boy, here's my service to you." Several actors, also, "used" the house,—amongst others, the centenarian Macklin, Tom King, and Dunstall. Many amusing anecdotes concerning the place have been preserved in the "Fruits of Experience," a delightful book of city gossip, written in his eightieth year by Joseph Brasbridge, a silversmith in Fleet Street. Brasbridge was a constant visitor at this tavern.

At Aldborough, near Boroughbridge, there is a Globe public-house, in which a tessellated pavement, part of a Roman villa, may be seen. The publican informs passers-by of this by the following inscription on his signboard:—

"This is the ancient manor-house, and in it you may see most of this description of signs, prompted by the vicinity of the building represented; CHARING CROSS, the sign of a shop that locality where they sold canaries in 1699, and also a sign at Norwich in 1750; THE OLD PRISON, in Whitechapel—The Old Prison was intended for King's Cross; CAMDEN HOUSE in Maiden Lane, 1668,—this must have been in honour of Edward Hicks, the opulent mercer, at the White Bear, in Cheapside, who died as Viscount Camden in 1628. He built Hicks Hall in Clerkenwell Green, and presented it to the county magistrates for their session-house.
The Romans work a great curioositea."

Further, there was the TEMPLE, the sign of Mr Buck, bookseller, near the Inner Temple Gate, in Fleet Street, in 1700; and at the same period, HYDE PARK, a shop or tavern in Gray's Inn Lane. A public-house in Bridge Row, Chelsea, mentioned before 1750, and still in existence, bears the name of the CHelsea WATERWORKS. The Waterworks, after which it was named, were constructed circa 1724; a canal was dug from the Thames near Ranelagh, to Pimlico, where an engine was placed for the purpose of raising the water into pipes, which conveyed it to Chelsea, Westminster, and various parts of western London. The reservoirs in Hyde and Green Park were supplied by pipes from the Chelsea Waterworks, which, in 1767, yielded daily 1740 tons of water.

The LANCASHIRE WITCH, a sign of an exhibition of shell-walrus and petrifications in Shoreditch, 1754, was doubtless named after our old friend, Mother Shipton, born near the Petrifying Well at Knaresborough.

Even on the Continent we meet with a London sign,—viz., Verona, where, in 1825, the TOWER OF LONDON was one of the inns which recommended itself to English travellers in the following grand circular:—

"Circulatory.—The old inn of London's Tower, placed among the most agreeable situation of Verona's Course, belonging at Sir Theodosius Geronzi, restored by the decorum most indulgent to good things, of li-ber-ties, which are favoured from every art at same inn, with all ob-jects that is concern'd, conveniency of stage-coaches, proper horses, and good foragers, and coach-house; do offers at innkeeper the constant hope to be honoured from a great concourse, where politeness, good genius of men to delight of nations, round table, [table d'hôte,] coffee-house, hackney coach, men servant of place, swiftness of service, and moderacion of prices shall arrive to accomplish in him all satisfaction, and at Sir's who will the favour honouring him a very assur'd kindness."

York figures more frequently on the signboard than any other place in England. From the trades tokens we see that the Cr

"N.B.—Les Dames seront introduits dans la Loge avec la Ceremonie accoutumée ou le Serment ordinaire et le reel Secret leur seront administrees. On commencera a recevoir des Dames Jeudi 11 de Mars 1762, Mrs Maynard's, next door to the Lying-in Hospital, Brownlow Street, Leicester. La Porte sera ouverte a 6 Heures du Soir. Les Dames et Messieurs sont priées de ne pas venir après sept. Le prix est £1, 1s."—(Napier's paper, 1762.)

How the ladies were initiated—or, as the worthy secretary Beau Silvester's Lodge calls it, "inculcated,"—we are not informed; but certainly some modification must have been made in the usual ceremony attending the initiation of novices.

LLANGOLLEN CASTLE is painted on a sign in Deansgate, Manchester: under it is the following rhyme:—

"Near the above place in a vault,
There is such liquor fixed,
You'll say that water, hops, and malt,
Were never better mixed."

Many other castles occur, such as JERSEY CASTLE, on the token of Philip Crosse in Finch Lane, in the seventeenth century; ROCHESTER CASTLE, MITFORD CASTLE, HEREFORD CASTLE, WARWICK CASTLE, EDINBURGH CASTLE, &c.

Towns are often adopted for signs as a point de ralliement for the natives of such places, the birthplace of the landlord being generally the town which has the honour of his selection. THE CITY OF NORWICH was the sign of a house in Bishopsgate Street in the seventeenth century, either for the reason just alleged, because "the fall of Niniveh with Norwich built in an hour" was one of the penny sights at that period. COVENTRY CROSS was the sign of a mercer in New Bond Street at the end of the last century, evidently chosen on account of the silk ribbons manufactured in that town; and the CHILTERN HUNDRED, a public-house at Boxley, near Maidstone, doubtless refers to the well-known range of hills extending from Henley-on-Thames to Tring in Herts. In old times these hills were covered with forests, and infested by numerous bands of thieves. To protect the people in the neighbourhood, an officer was appointed by the Crown, called the steward of the Chiltern Hundreds, and although the duties have long ceased the office still exists, and is made use of to afford members of the House of Commons an opportunity of resigning their seats when they desire it. Being a Government appointment, though without either duties or salary, the acceptance of it disqualifies a member from retaining his seat.

To which a wag appended the following lines :—

"An honest soldier never is forgot,
Whether he die by musket or by pot."

The FLITCH OF DUNMOW is a common sign in Essex, and sometimes seen in other counties. The custom of giving a f of bacon, on the well-known conditions, is not peculiar to I mow. In the reign of Edward III., the Earl of Lanca lord of the honour of Tutbury, granted a manor near Wicl village, Burton-upon-Trent, to Sir Philip de Sommerville, stip ing that he was to give a flitch of bacon on the same condit as at Dunmow.* At the abbey of St Milaine, near Rennes Normandy, the same custom was observed, but the practice still less successful, for Dunmow at least has six times given side of bacon away, but—

"A l'abbaye de Saint Milaine près Rennes y a plus de six cents an un costé de lard encore tout frais et non corrompu; et néanmoins voué et ordonné aux premiers qui par an et jour ensemble mariez vescu sans debat, grondement et sans s'en repentir."†

Our next sign is geographical only in its relationship. At W ford Bridge, which crosses the river Nen in Northampton, t is the HAYCOCK Inn, deriving its name from a curious incid the river overflowed its banks and carried away a haycock wi man upon it. Taylor, the Water poet, says of the circumstance

"On a haycock sleeping soundly,
The river rose, and took me roundly
Down the current; people cried,
As along the stream I hied.
'Where away?' quoth they, 'From Greenland!'
'No; from Wansford Bridge, in England.'"

The stone bridge, of thirteen arches, carries the Great N Road across the river, so much traversed in the coaching tir and well known to many a traveller in those days was the E cock Inn, at one end of the bridge, which has on the signboa pictorial representation of the scene.

Scotland, which, besides Edinburgh ales and Highland whis produces a great many publicans, is honoured in numberless si LAND O' CAKES, the name given by Burns to the country of "brighter Scotch," is a sign at Middle Hill Gate, near Stockp And here we may observe the popularity of Burns among

* See Gentl.'s Mag., Jan. 1819, where the conditions are given in extenso.

† "At the abbey of Saint Milaine, near Rennes, there has been for more than 600 y a flitch of bacon, still perfectly fresh and good; yet it is promised and ordered to be s to the first couple that has been married for a year and a day without quarrelling, s ing, or regretting that they were married."—Corslet d'Entrap.

of the puddill be the Scottesmen in the realme of Polonia, qu
I saw an greate multitude in the town of Cracovia, anno 1 1569."*

GREYNA GREEN used at one time to be a not very uncommon sign on the Border; there is one at Aycliffe, Darlington. The origin of marriages at this place is not so generally known than it would be superfluous to introduce it here. Marriages in Scotland at all times having been considered legal if two parties accepted each other for man and wife in the presence of witnesses, a dissipated tobacconist, named Joseph Paisley, about a century ago conceived the idea of opening an establishment on the Border to unite runaway couples in wedlock. For this purpose he selected the common, or green, between Graitney and Springfield, Dumfriesshire, a place called Megshill, the first Scottish ground on entering the country from Cumberland; there he commenced business. In 1791 he settled in the then newly-built village of Springfield, but the reputation of his impromptu marriage-ten on Graitney Common, (or Greytna Green, as the English called it) had already so widely spread that the name of the place passed into a by-word for clandestine marriages. Paisley died in 1814, but marriage-mongering had become a trade in Springfield, and several self-appointed parsons started up to fill the office. Pennant says that in 1771 a young couple might be united "from two guineas a job to a dram of whisky" by a fisherman, a joiner, or a blacksmith; but the prices rose much higher afterwards, varying from £40 to half-a-guinea, and the last sum was only accepted from pedestrian couples. As a rule the fee was settled by the post-boys from Carlisle, each patronizing certain houses, and the hymeneal priests, knowing the value of their patronage, permitted them to go snacking in the process. It is estimated that about 300 couples a year used to get married in this off-hand manner.

Of our colonies, GIBRALTAR and the CAPE OF GOOD HOPE seem to be almost the only ones considered worthy the honor of the signboard. Gibraltar became popular as soon as the acquisition had been esteemed at its proper value. As for the Cape of Good Hope, the frequency of this sign all over England seems to render it probable that it was not so much adopted in honor of lery and other articles, which they carry in a box or basket, are called mar-kraam, apparently from marcher, to walk, and the above kraam.

* Skene, De Verborum Significatione at the End of his Lawes and Actes. Edinburgh 1597.

Clementi, and San Juan de la Palma ; the view is taken from the suburb of Triana, on the other side of the river. This "famous Henry Dighton," as he styles himself in an advertisement in 1718, "sworn perfumer in ordinary to H. M. King George," had chosen the sign of the City of Sevilla from the fact of his importing Spanish snuff, the fashionable mixture in those days, which the gallants dislodged with such airy elegance from among the lace frills of their shirts and neckties. His successor, Henry Coulthurst, promised "to furnish greater variety of the choicest and truest snuff than any perfumer in England, viz., Havana, Port St Mary's, Barcelona, Port Mahon, Seville, plain Spanish, and fine Lisbon." These Spanish snuffs had come greatly into fashion at the capture of Puerta St Maria, near Cadiz, when the fleet, under Sir George Rooke, captured several thousand barrels of snuff. But long before that time enormous quantities of Spanish tobacco had been yearly imported into England.

"There was wont to come out of Spain," said Sir Edwin Sandys, in 1620, "a great mass of money to the value of £100,000 per annum for our cloths and other merchandises; and now we have from thence for all our cloth and merchandises nothing but tobacco: nay, that will not pay for all the tobacco we have from thence, but they have more from us in money every year, £20,000; so there goes out of this kingdom as good as £120,000 for tobacco every year."*

The THREE SPANISH GYPSIES, in the New Exchange, was the shop of the future "Monkey Duchess," the nickname given by her aristocratic friends to Anne Monk, Duchess of Albemarle. "She was the daughter of John Clarges, a farrier in the Savoy, and horse-shoer to Colonel Monk. In 1632 she was married, in the church of St Lawrence Poultney, to Thomas Radford, son of Thomas Radford, late a farrier, servant to Prince Charles, and resident in the Mews. She had a daughter who was born in 1634, and died in 1638. She lived with her husband at the Three Spanish Gypsies, in the New Exchange, and sold wash-balls, powder, gloves, and such things, and taught girls plain work. About 1647, being a sempstress to Colonel Monk, she used to carry him his linen. In 1648 her father and mother died. The year after she fell out with her husband, and they parted. But no certificate from any parish register appears reciting his burial. In 1652 she was married in the church of St George, Southwark, to General Monk, and in the following is a good, civil woman, and has not much business."* At another Turk's Head, Gerrard Street, Soho, Johnson formed, in 1763, that well-known club, which was long without a name, but which after Garrick's funeral became distinguished by the name of the Literary Club.

* Parliamentary History, vol. I., p. 1105.

"Sir Joshua Reynolds had the merit of being the first proposer of it, to which Johnson acceded, and the original members were Sir Joshua Reynolds, Dr Johnson, Mr Edmund Burke, Dr Nugent, Mr Beauchamp, Mr Langton, Dr Goldsmith, Mr Chamier, and Sir John Hawkins. They met at the Turk's Head in Gerrard Street, Soho, one evening every week, at seven and generally continued their conversation till a pretty late hour. This club has been gradually increased to its present [1791] number thirty-five. After about ten years, instead of supping weekly, it was resolved to dine together once a fortnight during the meeting of Parliament."†

After the death of the landlord of this house, the club removed to the PRINCE in Sackville Street; and after two or three more changes, it finally settled down at the THATCHED HOUSE, St James's. The original portrait of Sir Joshua Reynolds, presented to the club by the painter himself, is still preserved; one of its peculiarities is, that the artist has represented himself wearing spectacles. The club is still in existence, under the name of the Dilettanti Club. "The Turk's Head in Gerrard Street, Soho," says Moser in his Memorandum-book, "was, more than fifty years since, removed from a tavern of the same sign, the corner of Greek and Compton Streets. This place was a kind of headquarters for the Loyal Association during the rebellion of 1745."‡

About that time there was a waiter in this tavern, who, like Tennyson's waiter at the Cock, Templebar, had obtained considerable celebrity. His name was Little Will. On an engraving dated 1752, he is represented as a small man with a large head and a periwig, dressed in a long apron, with a pair of snuffers suspended from the waist. The Rev. Mr Huddersford, of Trinity College, Oxford, in a letter to Granger, says,—

"Little Will, as I have heard, was a great favourite with the gentlemen of the coffee-house; there is a print representing him in his constant attitude, apparently insensible to anything around him, but swallowing every article of politicks that dropped, which, I am told, he understands better than any of his masters."

The THREE TURKS was a sign at Norwich in 1750,§ and even now, though the crescent is decidedly in the "last quarter,"

* Boswell's Johnson, vol. i., p. 304.

† Ibid., vol. i., p. 327.

‡ Moser's Memorandum-Book, M.S. dated 1790, as quoted in Notes and Queries, December 22, 1849.

§ Gent's Mag., March 1842.

to his great satisfaction and her credit. The patient had her shoulder-bone out for about nine years."—Grub Street Journal, October 21, 1738.

The coffee-house was closed in 1843; a bust of Essex is in front of the house it formerly occupied with the inscription "This is Devereux Court, 1676."

Various reasons are given to account for the sign of the SARACEN'S HEAD. "When our countrymen came home from fighting with the Saracens, and were beaten by them, they pictured the with huge, big, terrible faces, (as you still see the sign of the Saracen's Head is,) when, in truth, they were like other men. But this they did to save their own credit."* Or the sign may have been adopted by those who had visited the Holy Land either as pilgrims or when fighting the Saracens. Others again hold that it was first set up in compliment to the mother of Thomas à Becket, who was the daughter of a Saracen: formerly the sign was very general. During the time of the Commonwealth, the Saracen's Head in Islington was a place of resort for the Londoners. In the "Walks of Islington and Hogsden, with the Humours of Wood Street Compter," a comedy by Thomas Jordan, gentleman, 1648, the scene is laid at that tavern. It was also the sign of the house occupied by Sir Christopher Wren in Friday Street, which remained almost unchanged till it was taken down in 1844. The Saracen's Head, Snow Hill, is one of the last remaining, and, at the same time, one of the oldest, being named in Dick Tarlton's Jests as "the Sarracen's Head without Newgate;" and Stow says, "next to this church [St Sepulchre in the Bailey] is a fair and large inn for receipt of travellers, and hath to sign the Sarrazen's Head." The courtyard has still many of the characteristics of an old English inn, with galleries all round leading to the bed-rooms, and a spacious gate, through which the dusty mail-coaches used to rumble in, the tired passengers creeping forth, and thanking their stars for having escaped the highwaymen, and the holes and sloughs of the road. How many hearts, beating with hope on their first entry into London, have passed under this gate, that now lie mouldering in the quiet little churchyards of the metropolis: some finding a resting-place in Westminster, whilst others ceased to beat at Tyburn. It was at this inn that Nicholas Nickleby and his uncle waited upon Squeers, the Yorkshire schoolmaster. Mr Dickens describes the old tavern as it was in the last years of our mail-coaching, when it sculptured sign of an INDIAN CHIEF at Shoreditch, having the appearance of an old ship's figure-head; and, as a nomina præterea nihil, it figures in many places. In Dolphin I Boston, (Linc.,) there used formerly to be a sign with fanciful, masked-ball dressed figures on it, which were meant to represent the THREE KINGS of Cologne; but they conveyed little the idea of those holy personages, that the profanum vulgus called them the THREE MERRY DEVILS. Eventually, by a metamorphosis more strange than any in Ovid, these three devils were transformed into one very strangely dressed figure called the INDIAN QUEEN. The AFRICAN CHIEF, in Southwark town, is evidently a variety of these Indian chiefs.

* Selden's Table-Talk.

Another sign of venerable antiquity is the BLACK BOY. This is of old standing, appears from an entry in Machyn's Diary: "The xxx day of Desember 1562, was slayne in John St Gylbard Goldsmith, dwelling at the sene of the Blake Boy, the Cheap, by ys wyff's sun."

This Black Boy seems to have been a tobacconist's sign; for in Ben Jonson's "Bartholomew Fair" we find "I thought he would have run mad o' the Black Boy in Buckbury, that takes the scurvy roguish tobacco there."—Act i., Sc. 1.

In the seventeenth century, it was the sign of a celebrated ordinary in Southwark:—

"Jove, and all his hous'hold a'ter
Him, yesterday went crosse the water,
To th' signe of the Black Boy in Southwarke,
To th' ordinary, to find his mouth worke.
Here he intends to fuddle's nose
This fortnight yet, under the rose."

Homer à la Mode, 166

At the Black Boy in Newgate Street, the Calves' Head (which was sometimes held. It was not restricted to any particular house but moved yearly from one place to another, as it was found most convenient. An axe was hung up in the club-room crowded with laurel: the bill of fare consisted of calves' heads, dressed in various ways; a large pike, with a small one in his mouth, emblem of tyranny;) a large cod's head; and a boar's head indicate stupidity and bestiality.*

One of the early editions of Cocker's Arithmetic was published at the Black Boy. Such was the fame of this work, that even the Pythagorians swore in verba magistris, and αὔρος ἐν ᾧ set residing in London with the home of his childhood. At times friends brought up in the same town or village could meet each other, talk over bygone times, call up the recollections of early years, remember mutual friends, and drink a bumper to those left behind. Sometimes these feasts took a religious turn when a native of the county or district preached in the neighbouring church or chapel. Blessed occasions were these religious yet merry feasts of the olden time. But the "march of intellect"—that is to say, improved locomotion, the spread of reading, writing, and high notions—have done away with these meetings of warm hearts and jovial tempers as things low and vulgar.

* See Secret History of the Calves' Head Club. London, 1708.

JERUSALEM was sure to figure early on signboards of the inns at which pilgrims, on their way to the Holy Land, would want to put up; and long after pilgrimages were discontinued it was still retained as a sign. In 1657 we find it in Fleet Street. What the sign was like it is impossible now to say, but on the trades token of the house the Holy City is represented by a single building. There is another token extant of a house, also in Fleet Street, without date or name of the shop, on which there is a view of a town, with the usual conventional representation of the temple of Solomon. It was equally common in France. Regnard mentions one in Nogent:—

"Entrant dans la bonne ville
Cité Nogent
Jerusalem fut l'asile
Soleil couchant,
Bon séjour pour le pèlerin,
Vin du Vaulx, et le bon vin." *

On a house in the Rue Etoupée, at Rouen, there is a stone carved sign of Jerusalem, represented as a fortified town, with a figure arriving on each side, evidently meant for pilgrims. A similar idea seems to be conveyed by the sign of TRIP TO JERUSALEM at a public-house in Nottingham, and the PILGRIM in Coventry. There is still an Old Jerusalem tavern in Clerkenwell, so called after the Knights of St John, of whose hospital this house was the principal gateway.

MOUNT PLEASANT is a name frequently bestowed upon public houses, not always with any allusion to such a locality, but simply on account of its being an alluring name of the same maudlin class as COTTAGE OF CONTENT, BANK OF FRIENDSHIP, &c. There near the old road to Highgate. It was said to have derived name from the fact of a Danish prince or ambassador having resided in it during a great plague in London. Another tradition is to the effect that, early in the seventeenth century, upon some political occasion, great numbers of Danes left that kingdom, and came to London; whereupon the house was opened by an emigrant from Copenhagen, as a place of resort for his countrymen resident in the metropolis. This tradition probably refers to the reign of James I., who was visited in London by his brother-in-law, the King of Denmark, at which time it is very probable that there was a considerable influx of persons from the Danish capital. Coopen-Hagen is the name given to the place in a map accompanying Camden's Britannia, 1695. For many years previous to its demolition, the house had a great reputation amongst Cockney excursionists, and its tea-gardens, skittle-ground, Dutch pins, and particularly Fives Play, were great attractions. For this last game especially the place was very famous. The house possessed another attraction. From its windows a very fine view of London, the Thames, and the Surrey hills beyond was obtainable. The New Cattle Market now occupies its site, and a modern public-house only perpetuates the name.

* "On entering the good town of Nogent by sunset, I put up at the Jerusalem, which offers good accommodation for travellers, wine of Vaulx, and that good."

Besides the above-mentioned geographical signs, we have others of more modern introduction, such as the SOUTH AUSTRALIAN in Cadogan Street, Chelsea, and the NORTH POLE in Oxford Street, which last commemorates one of those equally brave and unsuccessful expeditions that have taken place every now and then since Admiral Frobisher first started on the discovery of the Meta Incognita.

There exists a class of signs in some respects geographical, yet from their indefinite character, they are more adapted for insertion in the following chapter than here. We allude to such tavern decorations as that picture of the fiery sun going down behind a hill, which is called THE WORLD'S END, at St George's, near Bristol; THE FIRST AND LAST INN IN ENGLAND, a sign which may be seen in many other localities besides at the Land's End in Cornwall; and NO PLACE INN, a public-house in the suburb of Plymouth, the sign representing an old woman standing at the door, accosting her husband, just arrived—"Where have you been?" "No place." Many others of an equally indefinite character might be given here, but they would be found to be even less topographical than those just named.

serve, or else there are some games to be playde in the afternoon, as lyin for the whetstone,* heathenish dauncing for the ring, a beare or a bull to be baited, or else a jackanapes to ride on horsebacke, or an interlude to be playde in the church. We speak not of [bell-] ringing after matins done."

Not much more than ten years ago, the good people of Paris were, every Thursday afternoon, in the summer, entertained in the Hippodrome, with "jackanapes on horseback," dressed up like Arabs, and followed by miniature chasseurs d'Afrique, to the great gratification of our martial neighbours. This sign is named in an advertisement, of the year 1700, for a mare stolen by "lusty black man with a brown coat,"† notice of the mare to be given "to Mr John Wright, at the Jackanapes on Horseback, in Cheapside. The grinning, or, as it was written, "GRENNIN IACKANAPES," is a sign mentioned by Eliot in his "Fruits of the French," or "Parlement of Praters," 1593, "ouer against the Vnicorne in the Iewrie." The HOG IN ARMOUR, in Hanging Sword Court, Fleet Street, is mentioned in an advertisement,‡ in 1678, as the place where there was to be sold "seacole sutt for the great improvement of all sorts of lands, as well as garden and hop grounds." It is named amongst the absurd London signs in the Spectator 28, April 2, 1711, and is still occasionally seen as in James' Street, Dublin. Though the sign does not exist any longer in London, yet the name is not lost among the lower order, it being a favourite epithet applied to rifle volunteers by costermongers, street fishmongers, and such like. A jocular name for this sign is the "pig in misery." There is also a GOAT IN ARMOUR on the Narrow Quay, Bristol, and a GOAT IN BOOTS on the Fulham Road, Little Chelsea. In 1663 this house was called

* A whetstone was anciently the name given in derision to a liar. The reason of is explained in the following rhymes under an old engraving in the Bridgewater collection, representing a man with a whetstone in his hand:—

"The whetstone is a man that all men know,
Yet many on him doe much cost bestowe:
Hee's us'd almost in every shoppe, but why?
An edge must needs be set on every lye."

How old is this connexion between lies and whetstones may be seen from Stow:—"The like counterfeit playshion have I noted (in the Summarie of my Chronicles, ann 1382,) to be set on horsebacke, his face to the horsetaile, the same taile in his hand as bridle, a collar of jordanes about his necke, a whetstone on his breast, and so led through the cite of London with ringing of bassons, and banished."—Stow's Chronicle, Howe's edition, 1614, p. 604. It is a curious coincidence that in France and Germany a knife—the Rodomont knife—was handed over to outrageous liars. A vestige of this custom was still preserved at the university of Bonn at the end of the last century, where, when one of the company at the students' mess drew the long bow a little too strongly, it was customary for all who sat at the table, without making any remarks, to lay their dinner knives on the top of their glasses, all pointing towards the offender.

† London Gazette, Dec. 23-26, 1700.

‡ Ibid., Jan. 10-14, 1678.

house. These arms are, a swan with his wings expanded, with a double tressure, counter, flory, argent. This double tressure might have suggested a gridiron to unsophisticated passers-by. PADDY'S GOOSE is, at the present day, a nickname for a public-house in Shadwell called the White Swan; but why it was thus travestied non liquet. This tavern acquired some notoriety during the Crimean campaign. When the Government wanted sailors man the fleet, the landlord of the house used to go among the shipping in the river and enlist numbers of men. His system recruiting was to go in one of the small steamers, with flags of colours flying and a band playing, the heart-stirring or heart-rending notes of which used to awaken the martial ardour of the merchant sailors, and make them enlist in the Royal Navy. The sign also triumphantly proclaims the presence of British gin and Irish whisky in a low public-house near the harbour of La Valette at Malta.

Not a few signs represent proverbs or proverbial expressions. The BIRD IN HAND, for instance, with occasionally the BOOK IN HAND,—the former denoting the landlord's full appreciation of the truth of the proverb, "One bird in the hand is worth two in the bush." It is frequently accompanied by the following truth rather than grammatical distich:—

"A bird in hand far better 'tis Than two that in the bushes is."

This sign occurs among the trades tokens, being literally represented by a hand holding a bird. Innumerable are the jokes resorted to by landlords to intimate that hard truth that credit is given.* Frequently the pill is gilded in the most agreeable manner: a deceptive hope of "better luck to-morrow" frequently held out, as "Drink here, and drown all sorrow;

Pay to-day, I'll trust to-morrow."

Or:—

"Pay to-day and trust to-morrow,
And so endeth all our sorrow."

The same in Holland:—

"Van daag voor geld, morg in voor niet."†

* Sometimes it is conveyed in an ingenious manner by a watch face without points accompanied by the significant words, No TICK.

† "To-day for money, to-morrow for nought."

Since man to man is so unjust,
 I cannot tell what man to trust.
 My liquor's good, 'tis no man's sorrow,
 Pay to day, I'll trust to-morrow."

At an ale-house in Ranston, Norfolk, the usual information conveyed in the following manner, (to be read upwards, beginning from the bottom of the last column):—

MORE	BEER	SCORE	CLERK
FOR	MY	MY	THIR
DO	TRUST	PAY	SENT
I	I	MUST	HAVE
SHALL	IF	I	BREWERS
WHAT	AND	AND	MY

At other places it comes in a still more "questionable shape," reminding us of the curious literary conceits of the old monastic rhymesters. In the following, the letters must be connected in words, thus—The brewer, &c.

Th. ebr: Ewe ! Rh. eH. Ass !
 en . TH I.S. cLEr k a N d ! IM. ustp, A. YM. Ys
 cO. r. of, O r IFIT r US. ! tandam, No tpA.
 i D wha. ts; Ha:
 LL i D , O! Fo Rm. Or .e.

The little wayside inn, between Pateley Bridge and Ripon, the following plaintive appeal to a stiffnecked race:—

"The malster doth crave
 His money to have,
 The exciseman says have I must.
 By that you can see
 How the case stands with me;
 So I pray you don't ask me for trust."

A small beer-house at Werrington, in Devonshire, yept Lengdon Inn, has:—

"Gentlemen, walk in, and sit at your ease,
 Pay what you call for, and call what you please;
 As trusting of late has been to my sorrow,
 Pay me to-day, and I'll trust ee to-morrow."

The Maypole, near Hainault Forest, has:—

"My liquor's good,
 My measures just;
 Excuse me, sirs!
 I cannot trust."

At Preston, in Lancashire:—

"Greadley Bob, he does live here,
 And sells a pot of good strong beer;

there, a pickpocket." Of the same class as the Cow and Ha WHO'D HA' THOUGHT IT? which sometimes is seen on an ale-house sign, as, for instance, at North End, Fulham. A wag suggests this as the motto to the coat-of-arms of a certain baronet-brev

"Who'd ha' thought it?
Hops had bought it."

The sign of the JOLLY BREWER—WHO'D HA' THOUGHT occurs in the Jersey Road, Hounslow. Originally, it seems have implied that, after a hard struggle in some other walk of life, the landlord had succeeded in opening the long-wished-for ale-house. So in Holland: many country retreats of retired tradespeople bear such names as "Nooit gedacht," (never expected,) &c.

WHY NOT, the name of a public-house at Essington, in Essex, seems to imply quite the reverse, and to have been adopted as the motto of a more sanguine landlord; unless it may be considered as a ready answer to the often-repeated question before "popping in round the corner," "Shall we have a drop?"

The LAME DOG is very common; but is particularly appropriate at Brierley Hill, near Dudley, the establishment being formerly by a collier, rendered lame in a pit accident. Under a pictorial representation of a lame dog trying to get over a stile, the following appeal is made to the thirsty and benevolent public:—

"Stop, my friends, and stay awhile
To help the Lame Dog over the stile."

Sometimes, as at Bulmer, Essex, we see a somewhat similar idea expressed by a man struggling through a globe—head and shoulders protruding on one side, his legs on the other—with the inscription, "HELP ME THROUGH THIS WORLD." The same allegory might have been seen on a beer-house in Holland in the seventeenth century, but the inscription was different—"Dus na in door de wereld," ("Thus far I have got through the world.") This sign is also called the STRUGGLER, or the STRUGGLING MAN, and at Hampton, where the house is kept by a widow, WIDOW'S STRUGGLE. In Salop Street, Dudley, the struggle is represented by a man, with a dog beside him, walking against a strong head wind. The LIVE AND LET LIVE has a somewhat similar meaning; it occurs at North End, Fulham, and in many other places. To this class, also, the following seems to refer:—"A witty, though unfortunate, fellow having tried all trades but thriving by none, took the pot for his last refuge, and set that way some time after, he found it altered into the Four A the sign painter who renewed the picture had probably found himself not equal to a representation of the four human figures. In Ireland, a similar corruption may be observed, the four shaver's awls taking the place of the four representatives of society. Although having no connexion with the Four A's, it may be mentioned that three and four awls constitute the charges in the shavers' arms of some of the continental trade societies or guilds.

This enumeration of the various performances coupled with the word all has been used in numerous different epigrams: address to James I. in the Ashmolean MSS., No. 1730, has:-

"THE LORDS craved all,
THE QUEENE graunted all,
THE LADIES of honour ruled all,
THE LORD-KEEPER seal'd all,
THE INTELLIGENCER marred all,
THE PARLIAMENT pass'd all,
HE THAT IS GONE oppos'd himself to all,
THE BISHOPS soothed all,
THE JUDGES pardon'd all,
THE LORDS buy, ROME spoil'd all,
Now, GOOD KING, mend all,
Or else THE DEVIL will have all."

This again seems to have been imitated from a similar description of the State of Spain in Greene's "Spanish Masquerade" 1589:—

"THE CARDINALS solicit all,
THE KING grauntes all,
THE NOBLES confirm all,
THE POPE determines all,
THE CLEARGIE disposeth all,
THE DUKE of Medina hopes for all,
ALONSO receives all,
THE INDIANS minister all,
THE SOLDIERS eat all,
THE PEOPLE paie all,
THE MONKS and friars consume all,
And THE DEVIL at length will carry away all."

The NAKED BOY was a satirical sign reflecting upon the constant changes of the fashions of our ancestors. William Herbert has this observation in his manuscript memoranda, "I remember very well when I was a lad seeing on Windmill Hill Moorfields, a tailor's sign, a naked boy with this couplet:—

"So fickle is our English nation,
I wou'd be clothed if I knew the fashion." *

* Annotations to Ames's Typographical Antiquities.

fashions. Samuel Rowland, in "The Letting of Humours Bloo in the Head Vaine," 1611, says :—

"Behold a most accomplish'd cavaleere,
That the world's ape of fashions doth appeare;
Walking the streete his humours to disclose,
In the French dowblet and the German hose,
The muffs, cloake, Spanish hat, Tolledo blade,
Italian ruffe, a shoe right Flemish made,
Like the Lord of Misrule, where he comes he'll revel."

And Heywood, in the "Rape of Lucrece," 1638, epigr. xxv. has :—

"The Spaniard loves his ancient slop,
The Lombard his Venetian;
And some like breechless women go,
The Russ, Turk, Jew, and Grecian;
The thrifty Frenchman wears small waist,
The Dutchman his belly boasteth,
The Englishman is for them all,
And for each fashion coasteth."

Shakespeare seems to allude to the sign of the Naked Boy in his "Comedy of Errors," act iv., scene 3, where Dromio says: "What, have you got the picture of old Adam new apparell'd. At Skipton-in-Craven, there is still a stone bas-relief of the Naked Boy, fixed in the front of a house, with the date 1633.

The GOOD WOMAN, or the SILENT WOMEN, and at Pershore in Worcestershire, the QUIET WOMAN, represent a headless woman carrying her head in her hand. Brady, in his "Clavi Calendaria," vol. ii., p. 203, says, "The martyrs who had been decapitated were, therefore, usually represented with headless trunks, and the head on some adjoining table, or more commonly in their hands; and it was easy for ignorance and credulity not only to mistake that type, but to be led into belief that those holy persons had actually carried their heads about for the benefit of believers. The sign, yet preserved, particularly by the oilshops, of the Good Woman, although originally meant as expressive of some female saint, holy or good woman, who had met death by the privation of her head, has been converted into a joke against the females whose alleged loquacity is considered to be satirised by this representation, which, to conform to such meaning, they now more commonly call the Silent Woman. The fact, however, of it being particularly an oilman's sign, makes it possible that it may have some reference to the heedless [heca anciently was pronounced heed] or foolish virgins of the parable who has made the following use of this sign : Under the representation of the Good Woman he has written in go letters, "Tout en est bon, depuis les" (a representation of pigs' feet) "jusqu'à la," (a representation of an enormous head.) This ungallant association of ideas of a woman a pig is, we are sorry to say, not without an example in our nation though fortunately our rudeness was two hundred years ago, we have grown more refined since :—

"One Ambrose Westrop, vicar of the Parish church Much to Sha in the county of Essex, taught in a Sermon That a Woman is worse than a sow in two respects; First: because a sowskin is good to make a saddle and her bristles good for a sowter. Secondly: because a sow run away if a man cry but hoy, but a woman will not turn her though beaten down with a leaver, and that all the difference between woman and a sow is in the nape of the neck, where a woman can run upwards, but a sow cannot, etc. The said Westrop is a great malicious and very envious and full of venome against the Parliament. But his benefit is sequestered, as well he deserves, from his filthiness and nastiness to the place."—Remarkable Passages and Occurrences of Parliament &c. December 8 to 15, 1644.

Lawyers, priests, and women have, at all times and in all countries, received a liberal share of abuse and slander and wonder, then, that the Lawyer kept the Good Woman in countenance. In a sign derived from the Good Woman the maxim of law is "damned to fame" as the HONEST LAWYER, the sign presenting him with his head in his hand, as the only condition in which by any possibility he could be honest. Another sign abusive of the softer sex is the MAN LOADED WITH MISCELLANEOUS, the sign of an ale-house in Oxford Street. The original, said to be painted by Hogarth, is fastened to the front of the house, has the honour of being specified in the lease of the premises as one of the fixtures. An engraving of it is exhibited in a window. It represents a man carrying a woman, a monkey, and a dog, the woman with a glass of gin in her hand. The background, on the left-hand side, is a public-house with a pair of horns as a "finial" on the gable end; this house is called "Cuckhold's Fortune," a woman is passing in at the door, and a sow is asleep in a pot-house, with a label above, "She is drunk as a sow," whilst two cats are making love on the roof. On the right-hand side is the shop of S. Gripe, Paumbr, in which a carpenter enters to pledge his tools. The engraving is signed: "Drawn by Experience; engraved by Sorrow." Under it is the following rhyme:—

not enjoying the very best of reputations. Those, at least, the World's End at Chelsea and at Knightsbridge were rather exceptionable. Both these houses were much patronised by the gallants of the reign of Charles II. when breaking the seven commandment; hence the altercation between two sisters in Congreve's play of "Love for Love:"

"Mrs Foresight. I suppose you would not go alone to the World's End?"

"Mrs Frail. The World's End! What, do you mean to banter me?"

"Mrs Foresight. Poor innocent; you don't know that there is a place called the World's End. I'll swear you can keep your countenance surely you'll make an admirable player."

"Mrs Frail. I'll swear you have a great deal of impudence, and in my mind too much for the stage."

"Mrs Foresight. Very well, that will appear who has most. You never were at the World's End? eh."

Pepys also honoured a World's End, the "drinking-house in the Park," with an occasional visit. On Sunday, the 9th May 1669, for instance, he went to church at St Margaret Westminster, and that duty performed, walked "towards the park, but too soon to go in, so went on to Knightsbridge, and there eat and drank at the World's End, where we had good things, and then back to the park, and there till night, being fine weather and much company, and so home." The "good things" evidently proved a strong attraction, for three weeks after he went again, "and there was merry, and so home late." In 1708 Tom Brown thus alluded to its equivocal reputation: "The lady must take a tour as far as Knightsbridge or Kensington, stop, maybe, at the World's End or the Swan; offer me a spark a small treat," &c.* Under the name of le Bout du Monde, the same sign was common in France, where in ancient Paris it gave a name to the street now called Rue du Cadran. With that inveterate weakness for punning inherent to sign painters—those of the French nation in particular—it was sometimes represented by a he-goat (bouc) and a world.

THE WORLD TURNED UPSIDE DOWN is still common, being generally represented by a man walking at the south pole; in this guise it was to be seen some twenty-five years ago on the Greenwich Road. But the meaning of the sign is a state of things the opposite of what is natural and usual,—a conceit in which the artists of former ages took great delight, and which they represented was all "moonshine." Another version substitutes thieves for a cheese for the smugglers and the brandy barrel.

* Walk round London and Suburbs, 1708, p. 46.

THE CRADLE AND THE COFFIN, or FIRST AND LAST, was formerly a sign in Norwich, and one can still be seen on the So Quay, Yarmouth. This combination may have its moral; so the equally serious MORTAL MAN, in the little village Troutbeck, near Ambleside, for there the denomination is simply borrowed from the beginning of the inscription which has something of the memento mori about it:—

"Thou mortal man that liv'st by bread,
What is it makes thy nose so red?"

"Thou silly elf with nose so pale,
It is with drinking Burkett's ale."

This imaginary dialogue is supposed to be held by the figures on the signboard, the one a poor miserable-looking object, the other, who indulged in Burkett's ale, the chubby picture of health, with a nose like that of Bardolph, "clothed in purple." This sign was the work of Ibbetson; the picture is now gone but the verses remain.*

At Hedenham, on the road between Norwich and Bungay, there is a sign called TUMBLE-DOWN DICK, representing on one side Diogenes, on the other, a drunken man, with the following distich:

"Now Diogenes is dead and laid in his tomb, Tumble-down Dick is come in his room."

At Alton, in Hants, a drunken man is represented upsetting a table covered with cups and glasses. The verses underneath the picture are the same as at Hedenham, except that it is "Fanny" who is said to be defunct, and not Diogenes. At Wotton in Norfolk, another sign with this name represents a young old farmer in a red coat, with bottle and glass in his hand, fall off his chair in a state of Bacchi plenus. The earliest mention we find of the sign is in the Original Weekly Journal for April 26—May 3, 1718, where a murder is reported to have been committed at the Tumbling-down Dick in Brentford. "Tumble-down Dick, in the borough of Southwark," says the Adventurer No. 9, 1752, "is a fine moral on the instability of greatness and the consequences of ambition." As such it was set up in derision of Richard Cromwell, the allusion to his fall from power or "tumble down," being very common in the satires published

* A somewhat different version of these rhymes is given on page 40.

In pity then your kind assistance give,
Smoke of Swan's best that the poor bird may live."

To which a friend of his wrote the following reply:—

"The aged Swan oppress'd with time and cares,
With Indian sweets his funeral prepares.
Light up the pile! thus he'll ascend the skies
And Phoenix-like from his own ashes rise."

There is a well-known anecdote of a man named Farr, opened a tobacco shop on Fish Street Hill, and soon obtained good custom from the pun over his door, "The best tobacco Farr," rather than from the quality of his tobacco. Opposite him there was another tobacconist who lost his customers through his pun, but he regained them in the same way as he lost it for he fought Farr with his own weapons, and wrote up "better tobacco than the best tobacco by Farr." This joke thought so good that all his customers returned. Tobacco-pipes of the original "finest tobacco by Farr" are preserved at the Banks hand-bills in the British Museum, as a proof of truth of this history.

A LING, or codfish, strange to say, entwined with his suckles, was the sign of Nicholas Ling, at the north-west of St Paul's, where, in 1595, he published "Pierce Penny his Supplication to the Divell." An OAK was the sign of Nicholas Okes, a bookseller dwelling at Gray's Inn, published some of Taylor the Water Poet's works. His colophon represents Jupiter seated on an eagle between two oak trees. French publisher, Nicholas Cheneau, in the Rue St Jacques, Paris, in 1580, had also an oak for his sign, (chêne, an oak.)

John Day, another publisher of the time of Queen Elizabeth, had a sort of pun, or charade, on his name in the sign of RESURRECTION, his device representing a man waking a sleep with the words, "Arise, for it is day." The Castle and Flag was another of his signs. Richard Grafton, the first printer of the Common Prayer, who also printed the proclamation of Jane Grey as Queen of England, for which he fell under the displeasure of Queen Mary, had a tun with a grafted fruit growing through it. Stow made a pun upon this sign, so that one of Grafton's works was "a noise of empty tonnes unfruitful graftes," to which Grafton retaliated by calling his Chronicle "a collection of lyes foolishly stowed together." If Singleton had a GOLDEN TUN; Harrison, 1560, a hare sh

CHAPTER XVI

MISCELLANEOUS SIGNS.

SIGNS which could not well be classed under any of the foregoing divisions will find their place in this chapter, and hence a miscellaneous gathering may be expected. As in all inquiries it is proper to begin with the a. b. c., we shall do so here. The A. B. C. of the sign of Richard Fawkes, a bookseller, as the imprint of his works says:—

“In the suburbes of the famous Cytye of Lōdon, withoute Temple dwellynge in Durrresme rentes [part of Durham House, where now Adelphi stands] or else in Powles church-yard at the sygne of the A The year of our Lorde mccccxxx.”

This, we must admit, was a very reasonable sign for a “shop of letters.” Continental booksellers also employed it; among others, Jacob Pietersz Pactsy, of Amsterdam, in 1597; in the Hague such a sign gave its name to a street. About 1825 there was a public-house in Clare Market called the A. B. C., where an alphabet from A to Z was painted over the door. Even at the present day many public-houses are called the LETTERS; there are two in Shrewsbury, two in Carlisle, one in Oldham and others in various places. GRAND A is a public-house in East Dereham, Norfolk. LITTLE A was the sign of a tobacco-shop in Leadenhall Street, circa 1780; his tobacco-papers, presented among the Banks bills, were adorned with a portrait of “Jeffrey Dunstan, or Old Wigs,” one of the mayors of Gloucester, styled “Old Wigs” from his practice of buying those articles which he made an honourable living before ambition flamed in his soul and he entered upon a political career. GRAND B may be seen at Long Framlington, Morpeth; Q INN at Staleybridge and Q IN THE CORNER in Sheffield. Rhyming alphabets in nursery rhymes present us with the first and last, but the second we confess is somewhat mysterious: the Crowned Q, (a COURRONNE), which was an old sign in the Rue de la Ferronerie in Paris, is easy enough to understand, and one of those beautiful Rabelaisian strokes of humour which the public delighted in a century or two ago; indeed the sign continued in its old quarters until 1828. The Y was formerly a mercer’s sign in France, and may have originated from the custom of tying ribbons up in festoons, when they would assume somewhat the shape of

PLATE XVIII.

THREE ANGELS.
(Bank's Bill, 1770.)

NAKED MAN.
(From a print, 1542.)

FIRE BALLOON.
(Bank's Collection, 1780.)

THREE MORRIS DANCERS.
(Formerly in Old Change, Cheapside, circa 1662.)

"Odium quod certaminibus ortum ultra metum durat," says Velleius Paterculus, and the truth of the assertion is exemplified in the old national antipathy betwixt this country and our neighbours across the channel, whence the ANTIGALLICAN (the name assumed by a London association in the middle of the last century) could not fail to be a favourite sign. At present this feeling exists to only a very small extent in the minds of our lower orders; but formerly a Frenchman could not pass through the streets of London with impunity. Stephen Perlin, a French ecclesiastic, who wrote in 1558 a description of England, Scotland, and Ireland, says:—

"The people of this country have a mortal hatred for the French as their ancient enemies, and in common call us France cheneve [French knave], France dogue, which is to say, French rascals and French dogs. They also call us or son."

Grosley* devotes a whole chapter to this subject, and tells us that the French were ridiculed on the stage, and insulted and ill-treated in the streets. Even at the present day, when the penny romances are in want of a melodramatic villain, a Frenchman is sure to have the honour of personating him.

At the beginning of this century there was a tavern of this name in Shire Lane, Temple Bar, kept by Harry Lee, of sporting notoriety, and father of Alexander Lee, the first and "original tiger," in which capacity he was produced by the notorious Lord Barrymore. This tavern was much frequented by his lordship and other gentlemen fond of low life, pugilism, and so-called sport. The nicknames of the brothers Barrymore will give a tolerably good idea of their amiable qualities; the eldest was called Hellgate; the second Cripplegate, (he was lame,) and the third Newgate, so styled, because, though an honourable and a reverend, he had been in almost every goal in England except Newgate. This interesting family circle was completed by a sister, called Billingsgate, on account of the forcible and flowery language she made use of. The Antigallican is still in vogue, as there are three public-houses with that sign in London, besides some in the country, and an ANTIGALLICAN ARMS at New Charlton, Kent.

On the 29th of September 1783, the first balloon—or air-balloon as it was then called—was let off at Versailles, in the

* Tour to London, vol. I., p. 84. "A perfectly fair judge, and writing in the true spirit of a philosopher," says his translator. Grosley remarks that the foreigners would be in the wrong to complain of the rude insults of the lower classes, since even "the better sort of Londoners" liberally show their hatred to the French whenever they can find an opportunity.

imitated it, and so it finally became a sign, one which is now fast dying away, and being supplanted by coarse coloured prints, with absurd rhymes.

At the castles of the nobility the weary traveller formerly found food, shelter, and good "herborow;" the lower hall was always open to the adventurer, the tramp, the minstrel, and the pilgrim; the upper hall to the nobleman, the squire, the wealthy abbot, and the fair ladies. It was natural, then, that the CASTLE should at an early period have been adopted as a sign of "good entertainment for man and beast." Such a sign became historical in the Wars of the Roses; for the Duke of Somerset, who had been warned to "shun castles," was killed by Richard Plantagenet, at an ale-house, the sign of the Castle.

"For underneath an ale-house' paltry sign,
The Castle in Saint-Albans, Somerset
Hath made the Wizard famous in his death."

2 Henry VI., ac. v., sc. 2.

According to Hatton,* in 1708, the Castle Tavern in Fleet Street had the largest sign in London; next to it came the WHITE HART INN, on the east side of the Borough, in Southwark.

In the reign of George I., the Castle, near Covent Garden, was a famous eating-house, kept by John Pierce, the Soyer of his day. Here the gallant feat was performed of a young blood taking one of the shoes from the foot of a noted toast, filling it with wine, and drinking her health, after which it was consigned to the cook, who prepared from it an excellent ragout, which was eaten with great relish by the lady's admirers.

THE CASTLE AND FALCON (probably a combination of two signs, as there is a Falcon Court close by,) is the sign of an inn in Aldersgate, which house, or one on its site, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, was occupied by John Day, the most considerable printer and publisher of his time. In after years the house became a famous coaching inn, and its reputation spread to all parts of England, whence we meet, at present, with Castles and Falcons in various towns, as at Birmingham, Chester, &c. Although we incline to the opinion that the sign arose from a combination, still it is worthy of remark, that the crest of Queen Catherine Parr was a crowned falcon, perched on a castle, and of course represented as large as the castle.

The THREE OLD CASTLES occurs at Mandeville, near Somerton;

* "New View of London," 1708, p. 9.

Street and Mercery Lane, and is often mentioned in the Corporation Reports, under the title of the Chequer. It is situated in the immediate vicinity of the Cathedral, and was therefore appropriate for the reception of the pilgrims.

When the inn had another sign besides the Chequers, these last were invariably painted on the door-post; an example of this may still be seen at the SWISS COTTAGE, Chelsea. In or near Calcots Alley, Lambeth, was formerly situated an inn or house of entertainment called the Chequers. In the year 1454 a licence was granted to its landlord, John Calcot, to have an oratory in the house and a chaplain for the use of his family and guests, as long as his house should continue orderly and respectable, and adapted to the celebration of divine service.* The BLACK CHEQUERS in Cowgate, Norwich, is so called on account of the chequers being black and white, whilst others are red and white, blue and white, or in such other contrast as may be fancied by the publican.

The CROOKED BILLET is a sign, for which we have not been able to discover any likely origin; it may have been originally a ragged staff, or a pastoral staff, or a baton cornu—the ancient name for a battle-axe.† It is also the name for a part of the tankard. Frequently the sign is represented by an untrimmed stick suspended above the door, as at Wold Newton, near Bridlington, where it is accompanied by the following poetical effusion on one side of the signboard:—

“When this comical stick grew in the wood,
Our ale was fresh and very good;
Step in and taste, O do make haste,
For if you don't 'twill surely waste.”

On the other side:—

“When you have viewed the other side,
Come read this too before you ride,
And now to end we 'll let it pass;
Step in, kind friends, and take a glass.”

Though a very rustic sign, it was also used in towns; thus it occurs among the trades tokens of Montague Close, and was the sign of Andrew Sowle, a bookseller in Holloway Lane, Shore-ditch, in 1683.

* Allen's History of Lambeth.

† Siege of Carlaeverock, c. 11:—

“— on li respont
De grosses pierres et cornues.”

Excels each other operator in the Nation,
 In Coventry's known street, near Leicester Fields,
 At the Two Heads full satisfaction yields.
 Teeth artificial he fixes so secure,
 That as our own they usefully endure;
 Not merely outside show and ornament
 But ev'ry property of Teeth intent;
 To eat, as well as speak, and form support
 The falling cheeks and stumps from further hurt.
 Nor is he daunted when the whole is gone,
 But by an art peculiar to him known,
 He'll so supply you'll think you've got your own.
 He scales, he cleans, he draws; in Pain gives Ease,
 Nor in each operation doth fail to please.
 Doth the foul scurvy fierce your Gums assault?
 In this he also rectifies the Fault
 By a fam'd Tincture. And his Powder nam'd
 A Dentifrice is also justly fam'd.
 Us'd as directed 'tis excellent to serve
 Both teeth and gums, cleanse, strengthen, and preserve;
 Foul mouth and stinking breath can ne'er be loved.
 But by his aid those evils are removed."

London Evening Post, July 1760.

Taylor the Water poet (1632) mentions two taverns with the sign of the MOUTH, the one without Bishopsgate, the other within Aldersgate. Trades tokens of the first house are extant, representing a human head with a huge mouth wide open. An inventory is still extant of the stock in trade of this house in the year 1612,* which is not uninteresting. From it we gather that the wines drunk at that period in taverns were white wine, Vin de Grave, (a small white Burgundy wine,) Orleans wine, Malaga, sherry, sack, Malmsey, (Malvasia, a wine from the coast of Morea, sweet and white,) Alicante, (also sweet,) claret, &c. Beer seems to have been but little asked for by those that frequented this house; for whilst some of the wines were kept in such large quantities as seven hogsheads, there were only two dozen and eight bottles of ale. The names of the rooms in the house were "the Pomegranate," "the Portcullis," "Three Tuns," "Cross Keys," "Vine," "King's Head," "Crown," "Dolphin," and "Bell," all of them favourite tavern signs, and (as remarked on page 280) the usual names for tavern rooms. Among the utensils may be remarked fifteen silver bowls.

The MERRY MOUTH is still a sign at Fifield, Chipping Norton.

* Printed in Nichols's Illustrations of Manners and Expenses in Ancient Times, 1797.

who had been recently knighted by the king, took a leading part in these consultations. But "the fate of things lies always in the dark;" in the reign of George II. this same house became a great resort for the Whigs, who sometimes used to meet here as many as two hundred at a time, making speeches and passing resolutions.

For this reason it was proposed that Master Jephson the landlord should write under his sign:—

"Hoc Fonte derivata libertas
In Patriam, Populumq: fluxit."

"From this fam'd Fountain Freedom flow'd,
For Britain's and the People's good."

In this tavern, Law, subsequently famous as the Mississippi schemer, quarrelled with the magnificent and mysterious Beau Wilson; they left the house, adjourned to Bloomsbury Square, and fought a duel, in which the Beau was killed. The Kit Cat Club, in winter, used to meet at this house. This club was first established in an obscure house in Shire Lane; it consisted of thirty-nine distinguished noblemen or gentlemen, zealously attached to the Protestant succession of the house of Hanover. Among the members were the Dukes of Richmond, Devonshire, Marlborough, Somerset, Grafton, Newcastle, and Dorset, the Earls of Sunderland and Manchester, some lords, and Steele, Addison, Congreve, Garth, Vanbrugh, Manwaring, Stepney, Walpole, and Pulteney; Lord Mohun (implicated in the murder of Mountford the actor, and killed in a duel by the Duke of Hamilton) was also a member.

"The day Lord Mohun and the Earl of Berwick were entered of it, Jacob [Tonson, the secretary] said he saw they were just going to be ruined. When Lord Mohun broke down the gilded emblem on the top of his chair, Jacob complained to his friends, and said a man who would do that would cut a man's throat."*

Tonson, for fulfilling the duties of this honorary office, was presented with the portraits of all the members. After Jacob's death, his brother Richard removed the pictures to his residence at Water Oakley, near Windsor. A list of them is to be found in Bray's "History of Surrey," vol. iii., p. 318. Forty-three of them have been engraved by Faber in mezzotint. The name of the club is said to have been derived from the first landlord, who was called Christopher Cat; he excelled in the making of

* Spence's Anecdotes, ed. by Singer, p. 337.

But as the sun shines alike over good and evil, so respectable as well as disreputable persons have used him for a sign; thus Wynkyn de Worde, in Fleet Street, and Anthony Kytson, another early printer, and the publisher of some works of Master John Skelton, poet laureate, carried on business under this device. Taylor the Water poet mentions three Sun taverns: being compelled one day on his "pennylesse pilgrimage," to dine à la belle étoile, he says:—"I made virtue of necessity, and went to breakefast in the Sunne: I have fared better at three Sunnes many a time before now: in Aldersgate Street, Criplegate, and New Fish Street; but here is the oddss: at those Sunnes they will come vpon a man with a tauerne bill as sharp cutting as a taylor's bill of items: a watchman's bill or a watch hooke falls not halfe so heauy vpon a man."^{*} The Sun on Fish Street Hill is also named by Pepys:—

"Dec. 22, 1660.—Went to the Sun Tavern on Fish Street Hill, to a dinner of Captain Teddimans, where was my Lord Inchequin, (who seems to be a very fine person,) Sir W. Penn, Captain Cuttance, and Mr Laurence, (a fine gentleman now going to Algiers,) and other good company, where we had a very good dinner, good music, and a great deal of wine. I very merry—went to bed, my head aching all night."

But the finest of all the Sun Taverns did not exist in Taylor's time; it was built after the fire of 1666, behind the Exchange.

"Behind? I'll ne'er believe it; you may as soon Persuade me that the sun stands behind noon."

These are the opening lines of a ballad of 1672, entitled "The Glory of the Sun Tavern, behind the Exchange."† From this ballad it is evident that the tavern was splendidly furnished, and offered comforts not generally to be met with at that time.

"There every chamber has an aqueduct,
As if the sun had fire for water truckt,
Water as 't were exhal'd up to heavens sprouds,
To cool your cups and glasses in the clouds."

Pepys was a frequent visitor at this house, and, in fact, all the pleasure-seekers of that mad reign patronised it; the profligate Duke of Buckingham, in particular, was a constant customer. Simon Wadloe, the landlord, had made his fortune at the Devil in St Dunstan's, whereupon he went to live in the country, and spent his money in a couple of years. He then "choused" Nick Colbourn out of the Sun, and Nick, who had amassed a handsome ^{*} Taylor's Pennylesse Pilgrimage, 1630.

† Luttrell Ballads, II., fol. 92.

competence in the house, was easily persuaded to retire, and left it "to live like a prince in the country," says Pepys. During the reign of Charles II., the house appears to have had an excellent custom, and was from morning till night full of the best company. The Sun Tavern, in Clare Street, was one of the haunts of the witty Joe Miller, and is often given as the locality of his jokes :—

"Joe Miller, sitting one day in the window of the Sun Tavern, Clare Street, a fish woman and her maid passing by, the woman cried : 'Buy my soals, buy my maids!' 'Ah! you wicked old creature,' cry'd honest Joe, 'what, are you not content to sell your own soul, but you must sell your maid's too?'"

A stereotype joke of the publican connected with the Sun is the motto, "the best liquor [generally beer] under the Sun," which, of course, must be believed, for Solem quis dicere falsum audeat? Sometimes the sign is called the SUN IN SPLENDOUR, as at Nottinghill, the "splendour" having reference simply to the golden beams or rays usually drawn by the painter. There is still a carved stone sign of the Sun, now gilt, dating from the seventeenth century, walled in the front of a house in the Poultry.

The GOLDEN SUN was the sign of Ulrich Gering, in the Rue St Jacques, Paris, printer of the first Bible in France, in 1475. At the end of the volume the Bible thus addresses the reader :—

"Jam tribus undecimus lustris Francos Ludovicus
Rexerat; Ulricus, Martinus, itemque Michael
Orti Teutonia, hanc mihi composuere figuram
Parisi arte sua; me correctam vigilanter
Venalem in vico Jacobi Sol Aureus offert."*

Their successor, Berthold Rumbold, on removing the business to another house in the same street, opposite the Rue Fromental, kept the same sign, and there it continued as late as 1689, having constantly been in the hands of booksellers. Not improbably the first printers, both in England and abroad, adopted the sign of the Sun, as an emblem of the new era opened to the world by the invention of printing, which, when they reflected on their discovery, they saw would, at no distant period, spread an er the world, as brilliant and as vivifying as sun.*

* "Already had Louis XI. reigned fifteen years over the French when Ulrich and Martin [Crantz] and Michel [Friburger,] all natives of Germany, produced me in this shape at Paris by their art; carefully corrected, I am now offered for sale in the Rue St Jacques, at the Golden Sun."

Sun occurs in endless combinations, often any other reason than a whim, and an alliteration; the SUN AND SAWYERS; the SUN AND SWORD; the N; or quartered with other signs, as the DIAL; FALCON; LAST; HORSESHOE, &c. Several others of the same sort, occur among the signs of the present day. The SUN AND a red sign, walled up in the façade of a house, Southwark. Were it not for the initials taken for a rebus on the name Harrison; as aocular corruption of the Sun and Hart, the H. (See p. 109.) is nearly as common as the sun in his meridian; of the favourable omen it presents for a man commencing business. In 1726 it was the sign of a noted tavern in Islington, where some merry doings went on occasionally:—

"ON TUESDAY NEXT, being Shrove Tuesday, will be a fine hog barbygu'd whole at the house of Peter Brett, at the Rising Sun, in Islington Road, with other diversions. It is the house where the ox was roasted whole at Christmas last."—Mist's Journal, February 9, 1726.

To barbecue a hog, was a West Indian term for roasting a whole pig, stuffed with spice, and basted with Madeira wine.

The RISING SUN AND SEVEN STARS was the very appropriate sign, at which was printed a work on "Astrological Optics;" but better still, it was printed for R. Moon, whose shop was "in Paul's Churchyard, in the New Building, between the two North Doors, 1655." An old jest-book says that an Irishman, seeing the sign of the Rising Sun was kept by A (nthon) Moon, accused the said Moon of having made a bull, for saying that the Sun was kept by the Moon.

One of the learned questions propounded by Hudibras to that cunning man, Sidrophel, the Rosicrucian, was:—

"Tell me but what's the natural cause

Why on a sign no painter draws

The full moon ever, but the half."—Hudibras, part iii., c. 3.

This might be true in Butler's time, but is no longer so; at

* This idea is in a measure set forth in some lines on the titlepage of "Gasparini Pergamensis Epistolarium opus per Joannem Lapidarium Sorbonensis Scholæ Priorem multis vigiliis ex corrupto integrum affectum ingeniosa arte impressoria in lucem redactum," 1470, beginning:—

"Ut sol lumen sic doctrinam fundis in Orbem."

Leicester, for instance, there are two signs of the FULL MOON, and it occurs in many other places. The Crescent, or HALF-MOON, was the emblem of the temporal power, as the Sun was the distinction of the spiritual.

Ben Jonson once desiring a glass of sack, went to the Half-Moon Tavern, in Aldersgate Street, but found it closed, so he adjourned to the Sun Tavern, in Long Lane, and wrote this epigram :—

“ Since the Half Moon is so unkind,
To make me go about,
The Sun my money now shall have,
And the Moon shall go without.”

The Half-Moon, Upper Holloway, was famous in the last century for excellent cheesecakes, which were hawked about the streets of London, by a man on horseback, and formed one of the London cries. This circumstance is noticed in a poem in the Gentleman's Magazine for 1743, entitled “A Journey to Nottingham.” In April 1747, the following advertisement appeared in the same magazine :—

“ HALF-MOON TAVERN, Cheapside, April 13. His Royal Highness the Duke of Cumberland having restored peace to Britain, by the ever memorable Battle of Culloden, fought on the 16th of April 1745, the choice spirits have agreed to celebrate that day annually by A GRAND JUBILEE in the MOON, of which the Stars are hereby acquainted and summoned to shine with their brightest Lustre by 6 o'clock on Thursday next in the Evening.”

The CRESCENT AND ANCHOR is a sign at Norton-in-Hales, near Market Drayton ; the HALF-MOON AND SEVEN STARS at Aston Clinton, near Tring ; and the SUN, MOON, AND SEVEN STARS at Blisworth, in Northampton. These SEVEN STARS have always been great favourites ; they seem to be the same pleiad which is used as a Masonic emblem—a circle of six stars, with one in the centre ; but to tell to ears profane, what this emblem means, would be disclosing the sacred arcana. The SEVEN STARS was the sign of Richard Moone, before he was so ambitious as to place the whole firmament on his sign : in 1653 he printed—

“ THE FIRST addresses to his Excellence the Lord General, &c., by John Spittlehouse, a late Member of the Army, and a servant to the Saints of the Most High God, &c. London, printed by J. C., for himself and Richard Moon, at the Seven Stars, in Paul's Churchyard, near the great North Door. 1653.”

As a change upon the Seven Stars, a publican at Counterlip, Bristol, has put up the FOURTEEN STARS, we have seen (p. 492) that the sign of the STAR was "calculated for every lewd purpose;" a great change certainly from æreal times, when a star was the emblem of the Holy Virgin, was thus styled Maris Stella (star of the sea)—the signification of the name Miriam in Hebrew—or Stella Jacobi, (star of Jacob,) Stella Matutina, (morning star,) Stella non erratica, (star, unerring star,) &c.; a star being always painted either on the right shoulder, or on her veil, as may be readily observed in the works of the early Italian masters in our National Gallery. A star of sixteen rays is the crest of the Innholders' Company. Oliver Cromwell used to meet some of his party at the Star in Coleman Street, as was deposed by one of the witnesses in the trial of Hugh Peters:—

"Gunter. My Lord, I was servant at the Star in Coleman Street, with one Hildesley. That house was a house where Oliver Cromwell and several of that party did use to meet in consultation."

John Bunyan died in 1682 at the Star, on Snowhill, in the house of his friend, Mr Strudwick, a grocer.

The POLE STAR is now a not uncommon sign. To make this device more intelligible, tavern-keepers ought to attach to it the motto it bore in the middle ages, when it was a symbol of the Church: "qui me non aspicit errat." (He who does not look at me goes astray.) The STAR AND CROWN was the sign of a haberdasher in Princes Street, Coventry Street, 1785, who, among other things, sold "dress and undress hoops."

The signs of the zodiac appear occasionally to have been adopted by conjurors and astrologers. Ned Ward describes them as figuring, in his time, on the door of "a star-peeper," in Prescott Street.*

The TWO TWINS, or NAKED BOYS, was the sign of a quack in Moorfields, "near the steps going out of the Lower Field into the Middle Field. There is a door above the steps, and another below the steps, with the Twins, and the name Langham on both doors;—keep the bill to prevent mistaking the house or being sent to a wrong place."† To such lengthy explanations our ancestors were compelled to resort in the absence of numbers on their houses. Either this quack had adopted the Two Twins on account of his obstetrical pretensions, or he was an astrologer as well as a quack, for Moorfields was the head-quarters of

* London Spy, part xiii., p. 319, 1706.

† Hanbill in Harleian Collection, p. 5964.

"Augurs and soothsayers, astrologers, Diviners, and interpreters of dreams."

In the last case he might have chosen it as being the ascendant of the city of London, which "stands in a benign and temperate climate, in the latitude of 52° and longitude of 19° 15',—having (as artists reckon) the celestial twins, the house of Mercury, patron of merchandise and ingenious arts, for her ascendant."*

The RAINBOW, in Fleet Street, opposite Chancery Lane, is the oldest coffee-house in London :—

"I find it recorded that one James Farr, a barber, who kept the coffee-house, which is now the Rainbow, by the Inner Temple gate, (one of the first in England,) was, in the year 1657, presented by the inquest of St Dunstan's in the West, for making and selling a sort of liquor called Coffee, as a great nuisance and prejudice to the neighbourhood, &c., and who would have thought London would ever have had near three thousand such nuisances, and that coffee would have been (as now) so much drank by the best of quality and physicians."†

The presentation here alluded to is still preserved among the records of St Sepulchre's Church. It says :—

"We present James Farr, Barber, for making and selling a drink called coffee, whereby, in making the same, he annoyeth his neighbors by evil smells, and for keeping of fire the most part night and day, whereby his chimney and chamber has been set on fire, to the great danger and affrightment of his neighbours."

This danger of fire was so much the greater, as a bookseller, Samuel Speedal, had his shop in the same house. In 1682, the Phoenix Fire Office, one of the first in this country, was established at this place.

The THUNDER STORM is the sign of a public-house at Framwell-gate Moor, Durham ; and the HAILSTONE, at Knowle, Staffordshire ; both these houses may have taken their names from a severe storm, which visited the neighbourhood at or about the time of their opening, just as the HAYLIFT, at Wansforth, Northampton, is said to owe its origin to the fact of a man floating a long way down the river on a haycock, during an inundation, and landing near that place.

As for the WILD SEA, the sign of John Horton, over against Parson's Brewhouse, Croydon,‡ in 1718, no more plausible explanation occurs to us than that John Horton might have been a sailor in his younger days.

The HOLE-IN-THE-WALL is believed to have originated from

* A Compleat Description of London, Harl. MSS., 5953, vol. I.

† Hutton's New View of London, 1708, p. 80.

‡ Weekly Journal, Sept. 27, 1718.

the hole made in the wall of the debtors' or other prison, through which the poor prisoners received the money, broken meat, or other donations of the charitably inclined. The old sign of the Hole-in-the-Wall (see our illustrations) shows such an opening in a square piece of brickwork. Generally, it is believed to refer to some snug corner, perhaps near the town walls; but at the old public-house in Chancery Lane the legend is as we have given it. Hard-by, in Cursitor Street, prisoners for debt found a temporary lodging up to a very recent date. Trades tokens are extant of this house, which, about 1820, was kept by Jack Randall, alias Nonpareil, a famous member of the P.R.; on one occasion some verses were made containing the following lines:—

"Then blame me not, swells, kids, or lads of the fancy,
For opening a lush crib in Chancery Lane,
An appropriate spot 'tis, you doubtless all can see,
Since heads I've oft placed there, and let out again."

The poet, Thomas Moore, in the fast days when George IV. was king, and when pugilism and gin drinking were fashionable accomplishments, used to visit Mr Randall's parlour. It was here that he picked up his materials for those rhyming satires on the politics and general topics of his time:—"Tom Crib's Memorials to Congress, by one of the Fancy;" "Randall's Diary of Proceedings at the House of Call for Genius;" "A Few Selections from Jack Randall's Scrap Book, with Poems on the late Fight for the Championship."

At the Hole-in-the-Wall in Chandos Street, Claude Duval the highwayman was taken prisoner; whilst the Hole-in-the-Wall in Baldwin's Gardens was the citadel in which Tom Brown used to intrench himself from duns and bailiffs, with Henry Purcell the musician, as his companion in revelry and merriment. Tom Brown's introductory verses, prefixed to Playford's "Musical Companion," 1698, are dated "from Mr Stewart's at the Hole-in-the-Wall, in Baldwin's Gardens." Another Hole-in-the-Wall still exists in Kirby Street, Hatton Garden. It is a curious fact that the refreshment-room, or liquor-bar, attached to the House of Representatives at Washington, is known to most thirsty American politicians as The Hole-in-the-Wall.

Anciently, instead of being a painted board, the object of the sign was carved and hung within a hoop, hence (as we had occasion to remark on a former page) nearly all the ancient signs are called the "— ON THE HOOP." In the Clause Roll, 43 Edward

III., we find the GEORGE ON THE HOOP; 26 Henry VI., the HART ON THE HOOP; 30 Henry VI., the SWAN, the COCK, and the HEN ON THE HOOP. Besides these we find mentioned the CROWN ON THE HOOP, the BUNCH OF GRAPES ON THE HOOP, the MITRE ON THE HOOP, the ANGEL ON THE HOOP, the FALCON ON THE HOOP, &c. In 1795, two of these signs were still extant, for a periodical of the time says:—"A sign of this nature is still preserved in Newport Street, and is a carved representation of a Bunch of Grapes within a Hoop. The COCK ON THE HOOP may be seen also in Holborn, painted on a board, to which, perhaps, it was transferred on the removal of the sign-posts."* These hoops seem to have originated in the highly ornamented bush or crown, which latterly was made of hoops, covered with evergreens. In France, the Hoop (le Cerceau) was used as a sign. Jacques Androuet, a celebrated architect, and author of a work entitled "Les plus excellents Batiments de France," lived at the sign of the Hoop, whence he adopted the surnames of Jacques Androuet du Cerceau. In 1570 he published a book on metal-work, containing several designs for ornamental iron frames and posts to suspend signboards from. That names in this country also were occasionally derived from signboards, has been stated in our introduction. Of this practice, Sir Peter Lely, the portrait painter, was an illustrious example. He belonged to a Dutch family named Van der Vaas. His grandfather was a perfumer, and lived at the sign of the Lily, (perhaps a vase of lilies, with a pun on his name.) When his son entered the English army he discarded his Dutch name, and from the paternal sign, adopted the more euphonious one of Lilly or Lely; and this name he and his children afterwards retained. The famous Rothschild family is another case in point. From the RED SHIELD (the roth-schild) above the door of an honest old Hebrew, in the Juden-gasse, (or Jews' Alley,) at Frankfort, has been derived the name of the richest family in the world.

The HOOP AND BUNCH OF GRAPES was the sign of a public-house, in St Albans Street, (now part of Waterloo Place,) kept at the beginning of the present century, by the famous Matthew Skeggs, who obtained his renown from playing, in the character of Signor Bumbasto, a concerto on a broomstick, at the Haymarket Theatre, adjoining. His portrait was painted by King, a friend of Hogarth, engraved by Houston, and published by Skeggs himself. The HOOP AND GRIFFIN was a coffee-house in Leadenhall Street, circa 1700;* and the HOOP AND TOY is a public-house in Thurloe Place, Brompton. Here the original meaning of the hoop seems entirely lost, as its combination with the toy seems to allude to the hoop trundled by children.

* Looker-On, Jan. 1795.

The TOY at Hampton used to be a favourite resort with the Londoners till 1857, when it was pulled down to make room for private houses. Trades tokens of this house of the seventeenth century are extant. "In the survey of 1653 (in the Augmentation office) mention is made of a piece of pasture ground near the river, called the Toying place, the site, probably, of a well-known inn near the bridge now called the Toy."†

Cardmakers usually took a card for their sign, as the QUEEN OF HEARTS AND KING'S ARMS, which was the sign of a card-maker in Jermyn Street in 1803.‡ One of the Bagford Bills has: "At the OLD KNAVE OF CLUBS at the Bridgefoot, in Southwark, liveth Edward Butling, who maketh and selleth all sorts of hangings for rooms," &c. § Possibly he sold also playing-cards. These knaves, however, seem at one time to have been a badge, for at the creation of seventeen knights of the Bath by Richard III., the Duke of Buckingham was "richely appareled, and his horse trapped in blue velvet embroudered with the knaves of cartes burnyng of golde, which trapper was borne by foteman from the ground."|| The QUEEN OF TRUMPS is a public-house sign at West Walton, near Wisbeach.

The HEART AND TRUMPET is a somewhat curious sign at Pentre-wern near Oswestry, perhaps a corruption of Hearts and Trumps. Other games have produced the sign of the GOLDEN QUOIT, in Whitehaven, and the CORNER PIN, which is so common that it figures in a Seven Dials ballad, a parody on the Low-back Car:—

"When first I saw Miss Bailey,
 'Twas on a Saturday,
 At the Corner Pin she was drinking gin,
 And smoking a yard of clay," &c.

All bowlers know that the corner pins are the most difficult to

* London Gazette, Dec. 9-12, 1700.

† Lyson's Historical Account of Parishes in Middlesex, p. 75.

‡ Banks Bills.

§ Harleian MSS., 5962.

|| Grafton's prose continuation of John Harding's Chronicle, p. 188.

strike, and that from their fall with the rest depends whether the throw counts double or not.

Formerly the merriest day of the year in "Merry England" was certainly the first of May, but of its many festivities scarcely a trace is left except the dance of the sweeps and the sign of the MAYPOLE. Stubbe, with puritanical horror, thus describes the Maypole:—

"They have twenty or fourtie yoke of oxen, every one having a sweet nosegay of flowers tyed on the tippe of his hornes, and these oxen draw home this Maie pole (this stinckynge Idoll rather) which is covered all over with flowers and hearbes bounde rounde aboute with stringes, from the toppe to the bottome, and sometyme painted with variable colours with two or three hundred men, women, and children following it with great devotion. And thus being reared up with handkerchiefs and flagges streaming on the toppe they strawe the ground aboute, binde green boughes aboute it, sett up sommer houses, Bowers, and Arbours hard by it. And then fall they to banquet and feast, to leape and daunce about it, as the Heathen people did at the dedication of their Idolles, whereof this is a perfect pattern, or rather the thing itself."*

The same author also reports that it was customary for lads and lasses to go the night before May-day to the hills and woodland to gather branches and flowers to deck the houses with on that day, and that they used to "spende all the night in pastymes" to the great detriment of female virtue; Featherstone, another sulky puritan, scandalised the fair sex by the assertion that "of tenne maydens which went to fetch May, nine of them came home with childe."† The consequence of all this grumbling was that the Maypole was abolished in the godly times of the Commonwealth, and as a matter of course, revived at the Restoration—but its prestige was gone. At present it is only commemorated by hundreds of signboards. There is one on the outskirts of Hainault Forest, immortalised in "Barnaby Rudge," which has all the regulations of the house laid down in rhyme part of these have been quoted on p. 449. There is on the stable door:—

"Whosoever smokes tobacco here
Shall forfeit sixpence to spend in beer.
Your pipes lay by, when you come here,
Or fire to me may prove severe."

An old, and not uncommon sign, is the WHEEL OF FORTUNE which may be seen at Alington, Norwich, and in other places. This wheel is sometimes represented with four kings, one on

* Stubbe's Anatomy of Abuses, London, 1585. p. 94.

† Featherstone's Dialogue against Light and Lascivious Dancing.

ancestors delighted, such as handball, tennis, balloon or windball, stoolball, hurling, football, stowball, pallmall, clubball, trapball, nortchen-spell, cricket, bowling, &c. The HAND AND TENNIS, Whitcombe Street, Haymarket, is so called from the adjoining Tennis Court, erected in 1678. The OLD HAND AND TANKARD is a public-house sign at Wheatly, near Halifax. The HAND AND TENCH seems to point to a connexion with the followers of Isaac Walton; it was a mug-house in Seven Dials in 1717. The mugs in those days used to be suspended above the door, or on the sign-iron, not only in this, but in all the mug-houses, for the mug might be considered as much a badge of King George's friends, as the white cockade was the badge of the Jacobites.

The HAND AND HEART was, in 1711, the very appropriate sign of a marriage insurance office in East Harding Street, Shoe Lane.* Two right hands holding a heart was a very old symbol of concord. Aubrey gives quotations from Tacitus, by which he derives it from the Romans, and adds:—

"I have seen some rings made for sweethearts with a heart enamelled held between two hands. See an Epigram of G. Buchanan, on two rings that were made by Q. Elisabeth's appointment, which, being laid one upon the other, shewed the like figure. The heart was two diamonds, w^{ch} joyned, made the Heart. Q. Elisabeth kept one moiety, and sent y^e other as a token of her constant friendship to Mary Q. of Scots; but she cutt off her head for all that."†

The HEART IN HAND is still a common ale-house sign. A similar meaning is conveyed by the equally common HAND IN HAND or CROSS HANDS; at Turnditch, Derby, this sign is called the CROSS O' THE HANDS, and a corruption of this again is the CROSS IN HAND, at Waldron, Sussex. The Hand in Hand was also one of the usual signs of the marriage-mongers in Fleet Street. Pennant says:—

"In walking along the streets in my youth, on the side next this prison, (the Fleet,) I have often been tempted by the question, 'Sir, will you be pleased to walk in and be married.' Along this most lawless space was most frequently hung up the sign of a male and female hand conjoined, with 'Marriages performed within' written beneath. A dirty fellow invited you in; the parson was seen walking before his shop, a squalid, profligate figure, clad in a tattered plaid nightgown, with a fiery face, and ready to couple you for a dram of gin or a roll of tobacco."

The two hands conjoined is also common in France—where

* Postman, 1711.

† Aubrey, Remains of Gentilisme and Judaisme. Lansdowne MSS., No. 231.

the singular name of the house where tickets might be obtained for a lottery of plate in 1718.* The name in reality refers to the "Melon Gardens," which fruit was pronounced after the signboard orthography in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.

Pepys, on the 3d of August 1660, informs us that he dined at an ordinary called the QUAKER, a somewhat unusual godfather for a sinful tavern. This house was situated in the Great Sanctuary, Westminster, and was only pulled down in the beginning of the present century to make way for a market-place, which in its turn has made room for a new sessions-house. Tull, the last landlord, opened a new public-house in Thieving Lane, and adorned the doorway of this house with twisted pillars decorated with vine-leaves, brought from the old Quaker tavern. J. T. Smith presents us with a view of this house in the additional plates to his "Antiquities of Westminster."

The PILGRIM has been mentioned incidentally (on p. 434) as a sign at Coventry. There is another public-house of this name in Kew Lane. In 1833 a figure of a pilgrim was placed upon the roof of this house, which by concealed machinery moved to and fro like the Wandering Jew, doomed to wander up and down until the end of the world; it was, however, of contemptible workmanship, and very soon got out of order.

The GIPSY'S TENT occurs at Hagley, Stourbridge; the GIPSY QUEEN at Highbury and other places; and the QUEEN OF THE GIPSIES was the sign of the so-called gipsy house near Norwood. The queen alluded to was Margaret Finch, who died at the great age of 109 years; Norwood was her residence during the last years of her life, and there she told fortunes to the credulous. She was buried October 24, 1760, in a deep square box, as from her constant habit of sitting with her chin resting on her knees, her muscles had become so contracted that she could not at last alter her position. This woman, when a girl of seventeen, may have been one of the dusky gang pretty Mrs Pepys and her companions went to consult, August 11, 1668, which her lord duly chronicled in the evening: "This afternoon my wife and Mercer and Deb went with Pelling to see the gypsies at Lambeth, and have their fortunes told, but what they did I did not enquire." A granddaughter of Margaret Finch, also a so-styled queen, was living in an adjoining cottage in the year 1800.

* Weekly Journal, Jan. 18, 1718.

printsellers, and colourmen, was either in compliment to the scholars of King Edward VI.'s foundation, Christ's Hospital,—commonly called “the Blue Coat School,” from the blue tunic of the lads, or was named after the Bridewell Boys, i.e., foundlings and deserted children, who wore a blue coat and trousers, with a white hat. Until the end of the last century they used to attend at all the fires with the Bridewell engine, but on the whole they were an unruly mischievous set. There was a BLUE COAT coffee-house in Sweeting's Alley, near the Exchange, in 1711.* At present it is generally called the BLUE BOY, as at Old Swinford, Stourbridge; Minchinhampton, Gloucester, and in a few other places. In Islington there is still such a sign, and in Aldersgate Street, if we remember rightly, there is an ironmonger with such a decoration.

A very strange sign occurs amongst the Banks Bills. On a shop-bill dated 1698, is the following inscription: “At the signe of the TARE lives one Mr Grenier who makes all sorts of good rasors, lancets, sisers, very well, and all other sorts of instruments for chirurgeons.” The engraving represents two angels holding a tear by a string, surrounded by a quantity of surgical instruments, after the true meat-axe type, and vicious-looking enough to “draw tears of molten brass from the eyes of Pluto himself.”

The WEARY TRAVELLER occurs at Sutton Road, Kidderminster; the TRAVELLER'S REST in a great many places, sometimes accompanied by the phrase REST AND BE THANKFUL, which last advice serves as a sign to two public-houses at Whitehaven. Finally the FINISH was the sign of a notorious night-house in Covent Garden, kept at the beginning of the present century by a Mrs Butler. Here, according to “Tom Crib's Memorial to Congress,” the gentlemen of the road used to divide their spoil in the gray dawn of the morning, when it was time for the night-birds to fly to their roost. Crib (in reality Thomas Moore the poet, see p. 503) says that the congress is:—

“Some place that 's like the Finish, lads,
Where all your high pedestrian pads
That have been up and out all night,
Running their rigs amongst the rattlers,†
At morning meet, and, honour bright,
Agree to share the blunt and tatlers.”

This house was originally named the Queen's Head, but was

* Daily Courant, Jan. 27, 1711.

† Carriages.

APPENDIX.

BONNELL THORNTON'S SIGNBOARD EXHIBITION.

ON the evening of Tuesday, 23d of March 1762, the ladies and gentlemen of London were informed at their tea-tables, by means of the St James's Chronicle, of the following fact :—

“PROSCRIPT.”

INTELLIGENCE EXTRAORDINARY.

“Strand. The Society of Manufactures, Art, and Commerce, are preparing for the annual Exhibition of Polite Arts, hoping by Degrees to render this Nation as eminent in Taste as War; and that, by bestowing Præmiums, and encouraging a generous Emulation, among the Artists, the Productions of Painting, Sculpture, &c., may no longer be considered as Exotics, but naturally flourish in the Soil of Great Britain.”

Immediately under this notice was the following :—

“Grand Exhibition. The Society of Sign-painters are also preparing most magnificent Collection of Portraits, Landscapes, Fancy Pieces, Flower Pieces, History Pieces, Night Pieces, Sea Pieces, Sculpture Pieces, &c., &c. designed by the ablest Masters, and executed by the best Hands in the kingdoms. The Virtuosi will have a new Opportunity of displaying their Taste on this Occasion, by discovering the different Stile of the several Masters employed, and pointing out by what Hand each Piece is drawn. A remarkable Cognoscente who has attended at the Society's great Room with his Glass, for several Mornings, has already piqued himself on discovering the famous Painter of the Rising Sun, a modern Claude Lorraine in an elegant Night-piece of the Man-in-the-Moon. He is also convinced that no other than the famous Artists who drew the Red Lion at Brentford can be equal to the bold figures in the London 'Prentice, and that the exquisite Colouring in the Piece called Pyramus and Thisbe must be by the same hand as the Hole-in-the-Wall.”

Shortly after this advertisement, the Exhibition was opened. It was held in Bonnell Thornton's chambers in Bow Street: the hours were from nine till four, admission one shilling. The tickets had a catalogue prefixed to them. The names of the signboard painters given in this catalogue were those of the journeyman printers in Mr Baldwin's office, where it was printed. Hagarty alone was a transparent variation on the name of Hogarth, who had largely contributed to the fun and humour of the Exhibition.

The opening of the saloons was the signal for a perfect storm among the newspapers. The artists and their friends were terribly ruffled, and persisted in seeing in it a persiflage of their exhibition just then opened in the Strand. To this animosity, however,

7. A BLACK PRINCE. By Hitchcock.

8. [Over the Entrance.] AN HOLY LAMB; highly finished. By the GRAND ROOM.

[The Society of SIGN-PAINTERS take this Opportunity of refuting malicious Suggestion, that their Exhibition is designed as a Ridicule Exhibitions of the Society for the Encouragement of Arts, &c., and Artists. They intend theirs as only an Appendix, or (in the Stile of P. a Companion to the others. There is nothing in their Collection will be understood by any Candid Person as a Reflection on any B any Body of Men. They are not in the least prompted by any Jealousy to depreciate the Merits of their Brother Artists. Anims the same Public Spirit, their sole View is to convince Foreigners as their own blinded Countrymen, that however inferior this Nation unjustly deemed in other Branches of the Polite Arts, the Palm of PAINTING must be universally ceded to Us, the Dutch themselves cepted.]

1. PORTRAIT of a justly celebrated PAINTER, though an Englishman Modern.
2. A CROOKED BILLET, formed exactly in the Line of Beauty,* its panion. These by Adams.
3. THE GOOD WOMAN. A Whole Length, but no Portrait. By S [N.B.—It is done from Invention, not being able to find or for it.]
4. A STAR. By * *
5. THE LIGHT HEART. A Sign for a Vintner. By Hogarty. [N.B. is an elegant Invention of Ben Jonson, who in The New Inn c Heart, makes the Landlord say (speaking of his Sign :)—
*An Heart weighed with a Feather, and outweighed too :
A Brain-child of my own and I am proud on't.*]
6. THE HOG IN ARMOUR. By Thurmond.
7. A BUTTOCK OF BEEF. By Simmes.
8. THE VICAR OF BRAY. The Portrait of a Beneficed Clergyman, Length. By Allison.
9. THE IRISH ARMS. By Patrick O'Blaney. [N.B.—Captain O'Cutter stood for them.]
10. THE GENTLEMAN OF WALES. By David Rice.
11. BUTTER AND EGGS. By Simmes.
12. THE SCOTCH FIDDLE. By M'Pharson, done from HIMSELF.
13. THE BARKING DOGS. A Landscape at Moonlight. The Moon what eclipsed by an Accident. Whitaker.
14. THREE APOTHECARIES' GALLIPOTS. D'aeth's first Attempt.
15. THREE COFFINS. Its Companion. Finished by Shrowd.
16. A MAN. By Hagarty.
17. THE RISING SUN. A Landscape. Painted for The Moon, alias PHILUS MOON. By Morris.
18. THE MAGPIE. By Whitaker.
19. NOBODY, alias SOMEBODY. A Character.
20. SOMEBODY, alias NOBODY. A Caricature. Its Companion. these by Hagarty.

* In allusion to a well-known art-theory of Hogarth's.

56. THE GHOST OF COCK LANE. By Miss Fanny —*.
57. THREE PORTRAITS IN ONE.
58. ALL THE WORLD AND HIS WIFE. By Blackman.
59. CAT AND BAGPIPES. By Forster.
60. A perspective view of BILLINGSGATE, or Lectures on Elocution.
61. THE ROBIN HOOD SOCIETY, a Conversation; or Lectures on Elocution.† Its Companion. These two by Barnsley.
62. AN AUTHOR IN THE PILLORY. By —, Bookseller. First Attempt.‡
63. Liberty crowning Britania. By command of his Majesty.
64. View of the ROAD TO PADDINGTON, with a Presentation (sic) of the Deadly Never-Green§ that bears Fruit all the Year round. The Fruit at full length. By Hagarty.
65. THE SALUTATION, or French and English Manners. By Blackman.
66. GOOD COMPANY. A Conversation. Intended as a Sign for a Tobaccoist. By Bransley.
67. DEATH AND THE DOCTOR; in Distemper. By Hagarty.
68. HOOS NORTON.|| A Sign for a Music Shop. By Bransley.
69. ST DUNSTAN AND THE DEVIL.
70. ST SQUINTUM  AND THE DEVIL. Its Companion. By —.
71. SHAVE FOR A PENNY. LET BLOOD FOR NOTHING.
72. TEETH DRAWN WITH A TOUCH. A Caricature. Its Companion. These two by Bransley.
73. A MAN LOADED WITH MISCHIEF. By Sympton.
74. ENTERTAINMENT FOR MAN AND HORSE. A Landscape. By Bransley.
75. FIRST AND LAST. By Blackman.
76. THE CONSTITUTION; Alderman Pitt's Entire. By Hagarty.

BUSTS, CARVED FIGURES, &c., &c., &c.

1. A BLUE BOAR. By Lester.
2. TWO INDIAN KINGS. By Taverner.
3. A FLAMING SWORD of Paradise.
4. ST PETER'S KEY. Both these by Carey.
5. A BUNCH OF GRAPES from Portugal. By Pendred.
6. A DIVIDED CROWN. By Ward.
7. BIRMINGHAM CASE OF KNIVES AND FORKS. [See at the other end a this a SHEFFIELD CASE. Its Companion.] Both these by Agill.
8. A NAG'S HEAD, after the Manner of the Antient Bronzes. By Millwich.
9. A BLOCK, done from the Life. By Brown.
10. An exact Representation of the famous RUNNING HORSE. Black and All Black.

* Fanny Parsons was the girl who played such an active part in the Cock Lane ghost performances, Jan. and Feb. 1762.

† A famous discussion club held at the Robin Hood Tavern, Essex Street, Strand.

‡ Evidently an allusion to Edmund Curll, the notorious bookseller, who stood in the Pillory at Cheapside.

§ The gallows at Tyburn.

|| A corruption of Hook-Norton, the name of a small village in Oxfordshire, where the bogs formerly played upon the church organ. So, at least, the story runs.

 "St Squintum" was probably intended for John Whitfield, the famous preacher, whose personal appearance was the subject of numerous lampoons and caricatures at this time.

5. THE LIGHT HEART. A Feather weighing down a Heart in Scales.
9. THE IRISH ARMS. A great clumsy pair of Legs.
10. THE GENTLEMAN OF WALES. A Taffey with a great Leek in his hand.
19. NOBODY. A man all Legs.
20. SOMEBODY. A man all Belly, with a Constable's Staff.
23. A FREEMASON'S LODGE. A new Member blinded and befouling his eyes.
27. THE SPIRIT OF CONTRADICTION. Two Brewers bearing a cask, one Men going different ways.
30. THE DANCING BEARS. Bears in Men's cloaths, learning to dance, one great one amongst them, with a gold Chain round his Neck, the other a Dancing Master a Monkey, holding a Kitten on his Breast, and pinning its tail with the other.
31. BAND BOX. An Ass standing in a great Band-box.*
32. A MAN STRUGGLING THROUGH THE WORLD. The Sign of a Pair of Terrestrial Globes, with a Man creeping through it, his Head out at one End, and his Heels at the other.
35. A MAN IN HIS ELEMENT. A man gluttonizing.†
36. A MAN OUT OF HIS ELEMENT. A Sailor fallen off his Horse.
44. FOOTE in the Character of Mrs Cole. The wit lies in the under it, which is, Young Ladies educated here.
45. PEEPING TOM.‡ A Shoemaker trying on a Shoe on a Woman's Foot.
- BUT THE CREAM OF THE WHOLE JEST IS (49 and 50) two Boards behind the Curtains, (one on each side of the Chimney,) which, when they are lifted up, show the written Laughs of HA HA HE HE HE.
- 53 and 54 are two old Signs of a SARACEN'S HEAD and a QUEEN with their Tongues lolling out at one another, designed to represent the Czar and the Queen of Hungary. Over them is a great Bill, with this inscription, The present State of Europe.
64. A view of the ROAD TO PADDINGTON, with a Representation of a Deadly Never Green that bears Fruit all the year round. Tyburn, with three felons hanging on it.
65. THE SALUTATION, or French and English Manners, which is a Frenchman cringingly bowing, and an Englishman taking the Nose.
66. GOOD COMPANY. Three Men drunk, and burning one another with their Pipes.
69. ST DUNSTAN AND THE DEVIL. The Saint taking the Devil by the Tail with a Pair of Tongues.
70. ITS COMPANION. Doctor Squintum doing the same.
71. SHAVE FOR A PENNY, LET BLOOD FOR NOTHING. A man in the hands of a barber surgeon, who shaves and lets blood at the same time, by cutting at every stroke of his razor.

* This seemed to be a sort of slang phrase equivalent to the present—"I am in the eye;" it occurs in "Tom Brown," vol. II., p. 13, 1708. See also p. 467 of this † 35. From another source we learn that this was very different:—"No. 3 in his Element, a sign for an Eating-house,"—a cook roasted on a spit at a kiln and basted by the devil.

‡ In allusion to Peeping Tom, the shoemaker of Coventry.

that they intend theirs only as an Appendix or (in the Style of Painters) 'Companion' to the others. What is that but ridiculing, or an attempt towards it? They say 'there is nothing in their Collection which will be understood by any candid person as a Reflection on any Body or any Body of Men.' They might have spared this Assertion, for no Person, endued with the least Share of common Sense, can imagine so impotent and futile an Attempt a Satire or Ridicule on any Thing except the few Spectators who go there; which would have been better understood had it opened on the First of April.

"They also say, 'They are not in the least prompted by any mean jealousy to depreciate the Merits of their Brother Artists.' Which is owing to their Inability, not want of Assurance; for an Attempt in them to depreciate the Merit of the Professors of Painting and Sculpture, whom they are impudently pleased to call their Brother Artists, would be (to borrow a Simile from one of their own Productions) like Dogs barking at the Moon.

"Their sole View, etc., etc.—'Their sole View' (without any Breach of Charity) we may infer is that of filling their own Pockets by duping the Publick; for no private Men would by an Advertisement invite People to their House, and place a Porter at the Door to take a Shilling of them, with a Pretence of being animated by a public Spirit, for any other Motive.

"Bow Street, Covent Garden, April 27.

"The Society of SIGN-PAINTERS are obliged to the GAZETTEER for the above Remarks."

Articles and letters abusive of the Exhibition appeared in most of the newspapers, and not a day passed but it was attacked in no very measured terms. The committee, however, generally reprinted the articles in their own organ, thanking the critics for so successfully advertising their efforts, after which no more was heard from them. The following review, having very similar annotations upon the signs to those in the letter signed "A Despiser of all Trickery," may have come from one of their own pens. It appeared in a monthly sheet, entitled, "The London Register," for April :—

"Humour is confessedly one of the chief characteristics of the English nation. There is no Country that delights in it so much, exerts it on such various occasions, or shows it in so many Shapes. In conversation, in Books, on the Stage, we meet with it every Day; and it has sometimes been introduced, not without success, even into the Pulpit. To an Artist of our own Country, and of our own Times, we owe the Practice of enriching Pictures with Humour, Character, Plesantry, and Satire. Such an Artist could not fail of Applause in such a Nation as ours, and his Fame is equal to his Merit.

The original Paintings, etc., the Catalogue of which now lies before us, are the Project of a well-known Gentleman, in whose house they are ex-

* Under the title of—"PARTICULAR ACCOUNT of the GRAND EXHIBITION in Bow Street, with Remarks and Illustrations of it."

8. The Vicar of Bray: The Portrait of a Beneficed Clergyman, of Length. [The vicar of Bray is an Ass in a Feather-topped Grizzle, and Pudding Sleeves.—This is a much droller Conceit, and has more when executed, than the old Design of The Ass loaded with Preferment.]

9. The Irish Arms. By Patrick O'Blaney. [N.B. Captain T. O'Cutter stood for them. [A Pair of extremely thick Legs in white & ings and black Garters.]

12. The Scotch Fiddle. By M'Pharson, done from Himself. [The F of a Highlander sitting under a Tree, and enjoying that greatest of sure of scratching where it itches.]

16. A Man. [Nine Taylors at Work; in Allusion to the old Saying nine Taylors make a Man.]

19. Nobody, alias Somebody. A Character. [The Figure of an O all Head, Arms, Legs and Thighs.—This Piece has a very odd Effect, so drolly executed that you don't miss the Body.]

20. Somebody, alias Nobody. A Caricature. Its Companion. Both by Hagarty. [A rosy figure with a little Head and a huge Body, & Belly swags over, almost quite down to his Shoe-Buckles. By the St his Hand it appears to be intended to represent a Constable.—It might have been mistaken for an eminent Justice of Peace.]

22. The Strugglers. A Conversation. By Bransley. [Represents a and Wife fighting for the Breeches.]

23. A Free-Mason's Lodge, or the Impenetrable Secret. By a & Brother. [The supposed Ceremony and probable Consequences of w called making a Mason, representing the Master of the Lodge with hot Salamander in his Hand, and the new Brother blindfold, and comical Situation of Fear and Good-Luck.]

25. A Man running away with the Monument. By Whitaker. [Picture of a London Night, like the Farmer Returned, represents — the Watchmen in Town,

Lame, feeble, half blind.—

Two of these Cripples are pursuing the Thief, one crying out, Stop T. and the other, I can't catch him.]

27. The Spirit of Contradiction. Ditto. By Hagarty. [Two Br with a Barrel of Beer, pulling different Ways.]

28. The Logger Heads. Ditto. By Ditto. [Underwritten, the old of We are Three. Shakespeare plainly alludes to this sign in his Tw Night, where the Fool comes between Sir Toby Belch and Sir Au Aguecheek, and, taking each by the Hand, says, "How now, my H did you never see the Picture of We Three?"

30. The Dancing Bears. By Hagarty. [Most drolly conceived and cally executed.—Represents Four Bears on their hind Legs, dre different Characters, one with a gold Chain round his Neck, giving l Paw and Left, gravely practising Country-Dances, under the Tuition Monkey, drest like a Dancing-Master, and fiddling on a Krr-ten.—Seriousness and Solemnity of each of these Figures is incomparable. derneath is written, "Grown Gentlemen taught to Dance."]

31. Band Box. By Sympson. [Hieroglyphically expressed . . . Ass standing in a Bandbox.]

33. St John's Head in a Charger. [The dead Saint's Eyes, like the most Portraits, seem to be looking at you.]

Soupe Maigre in the other. 4. St Anthony is the Pope, mounted on a Bull, with a Crosier and a Vessel of Holy Water dangling from it, in one Hand, and a Cod-Fish inscribed Food for Lent in the other. From his Right Foot hangs a Scroll inscribed Kiss my Toe, and on the Ground several Rolls of Paper, on which are written, Pardons, Indulgencies, &c. &c. 5. St James is a Spaniard mounted on a Mule with an Ingot of Gold in one Hand and a Padlock in the other. 6. St David is Taffy mounted on a Goat brandishing a Leek in one Hand, and bearing a Cheese, by Way of Target, in the other. 7. St Patrick is an Irish Soldier, mounted on a large Stone-Horse, at whose Feet is a kind of Bill with this Inscription—To cover this Season Black and All Black. He has a Sword, bearing a Potatoe on the End of it in one Hand, and a three-square Bottle, inscribed Green Uaquebaugh in the other.]

53. An original Portrait of the present Emperor of Russia.

54. Ditto of the Empress Queen of Hungary, its Antagonist. [These are two old signs of the Saracen's Head and Queen Anne. Under the first is written THE ZARR, and under the other the EMPRES QUEAN. They are lolling their tongues out at each other, and over their heads runs a wooden label, inscribed, The present State of Europe.]

56. The Ghost of Cock Lane. By Miss Fanny —. [The figure of two hands, one bearing a hammer, the other a curry-comb, in allusion to knocking and scratching.]

58. All the World and his Wife. By Blackman. [The figure of a foolish-looking fellow, with the globe round his body, (like Orbis in the Rehearsal,) and his wife cudgelling him.]

60. A Prospective View of Billingsgate, or Lectures on Elocution.

61. The Robin Hood Society, a Conversation; or Lectures on Elocution. Its Companion. These two by Barnsley. [These two Strokes at a famous Lecturer on Elocution,* and The Reverend Projector of a Rhetorical Academy, are admirably conceived and executed; and (the latter more especially) almost worthy the Hand of Hogarth. They are full of a Variety of droll Figures, and seem indeed to be the Work of a great Master, struggling to suppress his Superiority of Genius, and endeavouring to paint down to the common Stile and Manner of the School of Sign-painting.]

64. View of the Road to Paddington, with a Presentation of the Deadly-Never-Green, that bears Fruit all the year round. The Fruit at full Length. By Hagarty. [Tyburn with three Felons on the Gallows. This Piece is remarkable for the Execution.]

65. The Salutation, or French and English Manners. By Blackman. [An English Jack Tar, kicking, and taking a tawdry Mounseer, cringing and bowing, by the Nose.]

66. Good Company. A Conversation. Intended as a Sign for a Tobacco-nist. By Bransley. [The Conceit and Execution are admirable. It represents a Common-Council-Man, and two Friends, drunk, over a Bottle and a Pipe. The Common-Council-Man is fallen back on his Chair as asleep. One of the Friends, an officer, is lighting a Pipe at his red Nose, while the other, a Doctor, is using his Thumb for a Tobacco Stopper.]

68. Hogs-Norton. A Sign for a Musick-Shop. By Bransley. [Represents (in allusion to the old saying concerning Hog's Norton) an Hog drest in a Laced Suit, and an enormous Tye Wig, playing upon the Organ.]

* Orator Henley is doubtless intended.

Addressed to the Gentlemen of the Society of SIGN PAINTERS.

THOUGH Malice darts around malignant Rays
And pow'rful Envy all its Spleen displays :
Go on, great Chiefs, pursue your noble Play,
And nobly end, what nobly you began.
Spite of Detraction shall your Mirth rise
With odoriferous Flavour to the Skies,
And Masmore's, Lester's, Ward's, and Fishbourne's Name,
With thine, Van Dyke, shall live to endless Fame ;
For your Collection Wit and Skill combine,
And Humour flows in ev'ry well chose Sign ;
To you the Palma, th' admiring World must give,
To you the Honour ev'ry Artist leave.
Regard not they the little-minded's Rage,
Nor dread the snarling Critic's angry Page ;
For conscious Worth shall be your safest Guard,
And Immortality your sure Reward.

April 27-29, 1762.

E. N.

- Bible and Harp, 473.
 Bible and Key, 235.
 Bible and Lamb, 255.
 Bible and Peacock, 255.
 Bible and Sun, 256.
 Bible and Three Crowns, 127.
 Bible, Sceptre, and Crown, 255.
 Birch-tree, 246.
 Bird and Bantling, 138.
 Birdbolt, 361.
 Bird in the Bush, 449.
 Bird in Hand, 446, 447, 448, 449.
 Bishop Blaize, 283.
 Bishop Blaize and Two Sawyers, 252.
 Bishop of Canterbury, 64.
 Bishop's Head, 315.
 Blackamoor's Head, 485.
 Black Ball and Lillyhead, 64.
 Black Bell, 479.
 Blackbird, 202.
 Black Boy, 432.
 Black Boy and Camel, 433.
 Black Boy and Cat, 105.
 Black Boy and Comb, 433.
 Black Bull and Looking-Glass, 187.
 Black Cock, 209.
 Black Crow, 203.
 Black Dog, 193.
 Black Dog and Still, 483.
 Black Doll, 486.
 Black Girl, 433.
 Black Friar, 319.
 Black Goat, 192.
 Black Greyhound, 195.
 Black Jack, 384, 385, 386.
 Black Lion, 120.
 Blackmoor's Head and Woolpack, 347.
 Black Posts, 373.
 Black Prince, 46.
 Black Ram, 190.
 Black Spread Eagle, 139.
 Black Swan, 215, 216, 473.
 Blaize, Bishop, 283.
 Bleeding Heart, 300.
 Bleeding Horse, 175.
 Bleeding Wolf, 143.
 Blind Beggar of Bethnal Green, 73.
 Blink Bonny, 175.
 Block, 363.
 Blossom's Inn, 297.
 Blue Anchor, 333.
 Blue Anchor and Ball, 333.
 Blue and Gilt Balcony, 376.
 Blue Balls, 483.
 Blue Bible, 253.
 Blue Boar, 118, 288.
 Blue Bowl, 395.
 Blue Boy, 510.
 Blue Bull, 195.
 Blue-coat Boy, 609.
 Blue Cock, 209.
 Blue Cow, 195.
 Blue Dog, 194, 195.
 Blue Flower Pot, 377.
 Blue Fox, 195.
 Blue Garland, 236.
 Blue Greyhound, 195.
 Blue Helmet, 326.
 Blue Horse, 170.
 Blue Lion, 146.
 Blue Man, 195.
 Blue Peruke and Star, 404.
 Blue Pig, 116, 195.
 Blue Posts, 373.
 Blue Pump, 397.
 Blue Ram, 195.
 Blue Stoops, 406.
 Board, 377.
 Boar's Head, 378, 379, 380.
 Boat, 334.
 Boatswain, 332.
 Boatswain's Call, 332.
 Boeuf à la Mode, 475.
 Bolt in Tun, 471.
 Bombay Grab, 328.
 Bonny Cravat, 406.
 Book in Hand, 446.
 Booksellers' Signs, 6, 7.
 Boot, 499.
 Boot and Slipper, 409.
 Bosom's Inn, 297, 298.
 Bottle, 387.
 Bottle and Glass, 337.
 Bowman, 363.
 Bowls and Candle-poles, 362.
 Boy and Barrel, 349.
 Boy and Cap, 849.
 Brace, 473.
 Brandy Cask, 349.
 Brass Knocker, 376.
 Brawn's Head, 381.
 Brazen Serpent, 7, 261.
 Breeches and Glove, 409.
 Britannia, 415.
 British Oak, 246.
 Brood Hen, 178.
 Broughton, 87.
 Brown Bear, 152.
 Brown Bill, 336.
 Brown Cow, 190.
 Brown Jug, 387.
 Brown Lion, 150.
 Brunswick, The, 50.
 Buchanan Head, 63.
 Buck, 471.
 Buck and Bell, 165.
 Bucket, 397.
 Buck in the Park, 127.
 Buckthorn Tree, 246.
 Buffalo Head, 186.
 Bugle, 188.
 Bugle Horn, 340.
 Bull, 182, 183.
 Bull and Bedpost, 187.
 Bull and Bell, 165.
 Bull and Bitch, 187.
 Bull and Butcher, 187.
 Bull and Chain, 182.
 Bull and Dog, 187.
 Bull and Gate, 62.
 Bull and Garter, 252.
 Bull's Head, 185.
 Bull Inn, 92.
 Bull and Magpie, 187.
 Bull and Mouth, 61.
 Bull and Oak, 188.
 Bull and Stirrup, 116.
 Bull and Swan, 188.
 Bull and Three Calves, 177.
 Bullen Butchered, 47.
 Bull in the Oak, 188.
 Bull in the Pound, 188.
 Bull's Neck, 186.
 Bumper, 390.
 Bunch of Carrots, 243.
 Bunch of Grapes, 243.
 Bunch of Roses, 236.
 Burdett, Sir Francis, 67.
 Burnt Tree, 246.
 Bush, 3, 4, note, 233, 234.
 Bushel, 347.
 Butler's Head, 63.
 Butt and Oyster, 381.
 Cabbage, 251.
 Cabbage Hall, 251.
 Cabinet, 393.
 Caesar's Head, 45.
 Camden Arms, 68.
 Camden Head, 68.
 Camden House, 416.
 Camel, 162.
 Camel's Head, 162.
 Canary House, 384.
 Cannon Ball, 327.
 Canute Castle, 45.
 Cap and Stocking, 402.
 Cape of Good Hope, 422.
 Cardinal's Hat or Cap, 315.
 Case is Altered, 460.
 Castle, 130, 417, 487.
 Castle and Banner, 488.
 Castle and Falcon, 487.
 Castle and Wheelbarrow, 488.
 Castles in the Air, 488.
 Castor and Pollux, 70.
 Cat, 197.
 Cat and Bagpipes, 438.
 Cat and Cage, 198.
 Cat and Fiddle, 438.
 Cat and Kittens, 177.
 Cat and Lion, 198.
 Cat and Parrot, 198.
 Cat and Wheel, 299.
 Caterpillar Hall, 251.
 Catherine Wheel, 298, 357.
 Cat in the Basket, 198.
 Centurion's Lion, 151.
 Chaffcuter's Arms, 352.
 Chained Bull, 182.
 Chaise and Pair, 176.

- Duck and Mallard, 218.
Duke's Head, 59.
Duncald, 67.
Dun Cow, 74.
Durham Heifer, 190.
Durham Ox, 188.
Dust Pan, 397.
Dusty Miller, 348.
Dwarf, 89.
- Eagle, 199.
Eagle and Ball, 199.
Eagle and Child, 138.
Eagle and Serpent, 198.
Eagle's Foot, 139.
Early Christian signs, 3, 4.
East India House, 415.
Edinburgh Castle, 418.
Eight Bells, 478.
Eight Ringers, 478.
Elephant and Castle, 155, 156.
Elephant and Fish, 156.
Elephant and Friar, 156.
Elisha's Raven, 264.
Elliott, General, 58.
Elm, 246.
Elysium, 73.
England, Scotland, and Ireland, 415.
English Arms, 129.
Essex Arms, 60.
Essex, Earl of, 60.
Essex Head, 60.
Essex Serpent, 80.
Exchange, 415.
Exmouth, Lord, 57.
Experienced Fowler, 361.
Express, 355.
Ewe and Lamb, 177.
- Falcon, 219.
Falcon on the Hoop, 220, 504.
Falcon and Horseshoe, 115.
Falstaff, Sir John, 67, 86.
Fan, 412.
Farmer's Arms, 136, 352.
Father Redcap, 96.
Feathers, 122.
Ferguson, James, 63.
Fiddler's Arms, 83.
Fifteen Balls, 127.
Fighting Cocks, 210, 252.
Fig-tree, 245.
Filho, 175.
Filho da Puta, 175.
Finish, 511.
Fire-beacon, 117.
First and Last, 436, 464.
Fir-tree, 246.
Fish, 230.
Fish and Anchor, 223.
Fish and Bell, 165, 230.
Fish and Dolphin, 230.
Fish and Eels, 231.
- Fish and Kettle, 231.
Fish and Quart, 231.
Fishbone, 231.
Fishing Cat, 439.
Fishing Smack, 334.
Five Bells, 331, 478.
Five Clogs, 410.
Five Cricketers, 484.
Five Inkhorns, 337.
Flaming Sword, 258.
Flank of Beef, 378.
Flask, 387.
Fleece, 58.
Flitch of Dunmow, 420.
Flower de Luce, 128.
Flower Pot, 376.
Flowers of the Forest, 81.
Flying Ball, 73.
Flying Childers, 175.
Flying Dutchman, 175.
Flying Fox, 170.
Flying Horse, 72, 365.
Flying Monkey, 444.
Foaming Quart, 387.
Foaming Tankard, 349.
Folly, 509.
Fool, 339.
Forest Blue Bell, 238.
Fortune, 73.
Foul Anchor, 333.
Fountain, 471, 494, 495.
Fountain and Bear, 496.
Fountain of Juvenca, 461.
(Four) 4, 477.
Four Ails, 451, 452.
Four Bells, 478.
Four Coffins, 371.
Fourteen Stars, 500.
Fox, 168, 472.
Fox and Bull, 169.
Fox and Cap, 170.
Fox and Crane, 169.
Fox and Duck, 169.
Fox and Goose, 168.
Fox and Grapes, 169.
Fox and Hen, 169.
Fox and Hounds, 169.
Fox and Knot, 170.
Fox and Lamb, 169.
Fox and Owl, 169.
Fox and Punchbowl, 388.
Fox's Tail, 170.
French Arms, 128.
French Horn, 339.
French Horn and Half Moon, 339.
French Horn and Queen's Head, 339.
French Horn and Rose, 339.
French Horn and Violin, 338.
French signs, 8, 11, 16, 17, 28, 35, 36, 37, 41, 279, 280.
Frighted Horse, 175.
Froggall, 232.
- Frying Pan, 396.
Full Measure, 349.
Full Moon, 500.
Full Ship, 330.
- Galloping Horse, 173.
Gander, 472.
Gaper, 467.
Gaping Goose, 444.
Garden House, 373.
Garrick's Head, 85.
Garter, 410, 411.
Gelding, 176.
General's Arms, 136.
Geneva Arms, 130.
Generous Briton, 415.
Gentle Shepherd of Salisbury Plain, 419.
George, 287, 288.
George and Blue Boar, 288.
George and Dragon, 40.
George and Thirteen Cantons, 289.
George and Vulture, 289.
George on the Hoop, 504.
Gibraltar, 61, 422.
Gipsy Queen, 508.
Gipsy Tent, 508.
Globe, 414.
Globe and Compasses, 147.
Glorious Apollo, 69.
Glove, 411.
Goat, 192.
Goat and Kid, 177.
Goat in Armour, 440.
Goat in Boots, 440, 441.
Godfrey, Sir Edmund, 64.
God's Head, 279.
Golden Angel, 269.
Golden Ball, 482.
Golden Beard, 405.
Golden Bell, 479.
Golden Bottle, 386.
Golden Buck, 165.
Golden Candlestick, 394.
Golden Can, 386.
Golden Cross, 276.
Golden Crotchet, 339.
Golden Cup, 149.
Golden Eagle, 198.
Golden Farmer, 352.
Golden Field Gate, 62.
Golden Pleece, 72.
Golden Frog, 232.
Golden Fryingpan, 396.
Golden Globe, 415.
Golden Griffin, 145.
Golden Head, 490.
Golden Heart, 300, 473.
Golden Jar, 397.
Golden Key, 398.
Golden Key and Bible, 255.
Golden Lion, 146, 201, 327.
Golden Maid, 364.
Golden Measure, 349.
Golden Quoit, 505.

- Jackanapes on Horseback, 436.
 Jackass in Boots, 443.
 Jack of Both Sides, 468.
 Jack of Newbury, 78.
 Jack on a Cruise, 332.
 Jacob's Well, 260, 274.
 Jamaica, 423.
 Jamaica and Madeira, 423.
 Jane Shore, 76.
 Jenny Lind, 83.
 Jersey Castle, 418.
 Jerusalem, 434.
 Jew's Harp, 340.
 Jim Crow, 81.
 Joey Grimaldi, 85.
 John Bull, 415.
 John of Gaunt, 46.
 John of Jerusalem, 274.
 John o' Groat's, 79.
 Jolly Brewer, 450.
 Jolly Butchers, 302.
 Jolly Crispin, 281.
 Jolly Farmer, 352.
 Jolly Toper, 466.
 Jonson's Head, 66.
 Jovial Dutchman, 425, 426.
 Jubilee, 100.
 Judge's Head, 335.
 Jug and Glass, 387.
 Junction Arms, 136.
 Juno, 60.
 Kangaroo, 162.
 Kettledrum, 322.
 Key, 397, 472.
 King and Miller, 74.
 King Astyages' Arms, 257.
 King Charles in the Oak, 49.
 King Crispin, 281.
 King David, 262.
 King Edgar, 46.
 King John, 46.
 King of Denmark, 52.
 King of Prussia, 54.
 King's Arms, 106.
 King's Head, 305, 306, 307.
 Kings and Keys, 302.
 King's Head and Good Woman, 455.
 King's Porter and Dwarf, 89.
 Kite's Nest, 178.
 Knowles, Sheridan, 60.
 Kouli Khan, 51.
 La Belle Sauvage, 482.
 Labour in Vain, 460.
 Laced Shoe, 409.
 Lads of the Village, 103.
 Lady of the Lake, 81.
 Lamb, 191.
 Lamb and Anchor, 300.
 Lamb and Breches, 191.
 Lamb and Crown, 191.
 Lamb and Flag, 300.
 Lamb and Hare, 191.
 Lamb and Ink-bottle, 229.
 Lamb and Lark, 191.
 Lamb and Still, 191.
 Lambert, Daniel, 88.
 Lame Dog, 450.
 Lamp, 376.
 Land o' Cakes, 420.
 Lass o' Gowrie, 81.
 Last, 349.
 Lattice, 374, 375.
 Laughing Dog, 444.
 Leather Bottle, 386.
 Lebeck's Head, 93.
 Lebeck and Chaffcutter, 93.
 Leg, 409, 494.
 Leg and Star, 494.
 Leigh Hoy, 333.
 Leopard, 152.
 Leopard and Tiger, 152.
 Letters, 476.
 Lillies of the Valley, 238.
 Linskill, Colonel, 99.
 Lion, 472.
 Lion and Adder, 299.
 Lion and Ball, 151.
 Lion and Castle, 128.
 Lion and Dolphin, 150.
 Lion and Goat, 299.
 Lion and Horseshoe, 180.
 Lion and Lamb, 299.
 Lion and Pheasant, 150.
 Lion and Snake, 299.
 Lion and Swan, 150.
 Lion and Tun, 150.
 Lion in the Wood, 149.
 Little A, 476.
 Little Devil, 294.
 Little Pig, 192.
 Live Vulture, 224.
 Live and Let Live, 450.
 Llangollen Castle, 418.
 Load of Hay, 353.
 Load of Mischief, 457.
 Lobster, 381.
 Loch-na-Gar, 81.
 Lock and Key, 398.
 Lock and Shears, 403.
 Locke's Head, 63.
 Locks of Hair, 403.
 Looking-Glass, 392, 393.
 London Apprentice, 79.
 London Signs, temp. James I., 8, 9.
 London Signs, temp. Charles I., 9, 10.
 London Signs after the Fire, 16.
 London Signs in 1803, 31, 32.
 London Signs in 1865, 42, 43, 44.
 London Signs, Roxburghe Ballad upon the, 13.
 London Signs taken down, 28, 29.
 Lord Anglesey, 64.
 Lord Bacon's Head, 63.
 Lord Byron, 68.
 Lord Cobham's Head, 97.
 Lord Craven, 59.
 Loving Lamb, 444.
 Lubber's Head, 147.
 Luck's All, 451.
 Lucrece, 80.
 Mad Cat, 196.
 Mad Dog, 196.
 Maggoty Pie, 221.
 Magna Charta, 46.
 Magpie, 40, 220.
 Magpie and Crown, 220, 221.
 Magpie and Horseshoe, 180.
 Magpie and Pewter Platter, 221.
 Magpie and Punchbowl, 388.
 Magpie and Stump, 221.
 Maid and the Magpie, 83.
 Maidenhead, 141.
 Maid's Head, 142.
 Mail, 355.
 Malt and Hops, 244.
 Manage Horse, 175.
 Man in the Wood, 472.
 Man Loaded with Mischief, 456.
 Man of Ross, 68.
 Man in the Moon, 303, 304.
 Mare and Foal, 177.
 Marlborough's Head, Duke of, 59.
 Marquis of Granby, 55, 58.
 Marrowbones and Cleaver, 358.
 Martin's Nest, 178.
 Martyr's Head, 48.
 Marygold, 237.
 Matrons, 321.
 Mattock and Spade, 353.
 Maypole, 506.
 Mazeppa, 68.
 Medieval Signs, 4, 5.
 Melancthon's Head, 97.
 Mercury, 70.
 Mercury and Fan, 70.
 Merlin's Cave, 77.
 Merry Andrew, 368.
 Merry Harriers, 194.
 Mermaid, 225, 226, 227.
 Merry Mouth, 491.
 Merry Song, 339.
 Merry Tom, 369.
 Middleton, Sir Hugh, 63.
 Million Gardens, 507.
 Millstone, 348.
 Milton's Head, 67.
 Minerva, 69.
 Miraculous Draught of Fishes, 275.
 Mitre, 315, 316, 317, 318, 319.
 Mitre and Dove, 319.
 Mitre and Keys, 319.

- Queen of Hearts and King's Arms, 505.
 Queen of Hungary, 55.
 Queen of Saba, 263.
 Queen of Trumps, 505.
 Queen of the Gipsies, 508.
 Queen's Arms, 107.
 Queen's Arms and Corn-cutter, 107.
 Queen's Elm, 246.
 Queen's Head, 130, 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 349, 510.
 Queen's Head and Artichoke, 312.
 Queen Victoria, 50.
 Quiet Woman, 454.

 Racoon, 162.
 Ruffled Anchor, 333.
 Railway, 334.
 Rainbow, 502.
 Raleigh, Sir Walter, 56.
 Ram, 190.
 Raven and Bell, 165.
 Ram and Teazel, 149.
 Ram's Head, 190.
 Ram's Skin, 190.
 Ranged Deer, 165.
 Rat and Ferret, 162.
 Raven, 201.
 Recruiting Sergeant, 322.
 Red Ball and Acorn, 483.
 Red Bear, 152.
 Red Bull, 185.
 Red Cat, 197.
 Red Cow, 188, 189.
 Red Dragon, 111.
 Red Horse, 171.
 Red Lion, 119, 327.
 Red Lion and Key, 472.
 Red Lion and Punchbowl, 388.
 Red M and Dagger, 325.
 Red Poles, 373.
 Red Rover, 81.
 Red Shield, 504.
 Red Streak Tree, 239.
 Red, White, and Blue, 332.
 Reindeer, 157.
 Rembrandt's Head, 82.
 Resurrection, 277, 474.
 Rest and be Thankful, 510.
 Rhenish Wine House, 384.
 Ribs of Beef, 378.
 Ring, 412.
 Ring and Ball, 484.
 Rising Buck, 165.
 Rising Deer, 165.
 Rising Sun, 118, 499.
 Rising Sun and Seven Stars, 499.
 Robin Adair, 81.
 Robin Hood and Little John, 75.
 Robinson Crusoe, 81.
 Rob Roy, 81.

 Rochester Castle, 418.
 Rodney, Admiral, 57.
 Rodney and Hood, 57.
 Rodney Pillar, 57.
 Roebuck, 165, 166.
 Rolls, 336.
 Roman Signs, 1, 2, 3.
 Rope and Anchor, 333.
 Rose, 124, 125, 126, 235.
 Rose and Ball, 126.
 Rose and Crown, 121.
 Rose and Key, 126.
 Rose and Punchbowl, 388.
 Rosebud, 238.
 Rose Garland, 236.
 Rosemary Branch, 238.
 Rose of Normandy, 237.
 Ross on Clinker, Captain, 99.
 Round of Beef, 378.
 Round Table, 79.
 Roxellana, 85.
 Royal Badges, 108, 109, 110.
 Royal Bed, 377.
 Royal Champion, 102.
 Royal Charles, 330.
 Royal Coffee-mill, 394.
 Royal Hand and Globe, 312.
 Royal Oak, 40, 49.
 Royal Standard, 105.
 Rummer, 389, 390.
 Rummer and Grapes, 239.
 Rum Punchoon, 349.
 Running Footman, 360.
 Running Horse, 173, 327.
 Running Man, 361.
 Russia House, 425.

 Saddle, 357.
 St Alban, 297.
 St Augustine, 297.
 St Clement, 297.
 St Christopher, 285.
 St Crispin, 281.
 St Cuthbert, 296.
 St Dominic, 320.
 St Edmund's Head, 296.
 St George and the Dragon, 257.
 St John the Evangelist, 296.
 St Hugh's Bones, 282, 283.
 St Julian, 283.
 St Luke, 286.
 St Martin, 284.
 St Mychel, 296.
 St Patrick, 295.
 St Peter and St Paul, 291.
 St Thomas, 296.
 Salamander, 158.
 Salmon, 473.
 Salmon and Ball, 231, 483.
 Salmon and Compasses, 231.
 Salt-Horn, 377.
 Salutation, 264, 265.
 Salutation and Cat, 265, 266.
 Samaritan Woman, 274.

 Samson, 70, 262.
 Samson and the Lion, 262.
 Saracen's Head, 430, 431.
 Saucy Ajax, 329.
 Saul, 290.
 Sawyers, 40.
 Scales, 362.
 Sceptre, 312.
 Sceptre and Heart, 312.
 Scotchman's Pack, 421.
 Sedan Chair, 358, 359.
 Seneca's Head, 65.
 Setter Dog, 194.
 Seven Sisters, 246.
 Seven Stars, 500.
 Sevilla, City of, 423.
 Shakespeare's Head, 66, 335.
 Shamrock, 127.
 Shears, 350.
 Sheep and Anchor, 330.
 Shepherd and Crook, 353.
 Shepherd and Dog, 353.
 Shepherd and Shepherdess, 352.
 Sheridan Knowles, 69.
 Sheet Anchor, 333.
 Ship, 328, 329, 471.
 Ship and Anchor, 330.
 Ship and Bell, 331.
 Ship and Blue Coat Boy, 331.
 Ship and Castle, 331.
 Ship and Fox, 331.
 Ship and Notchblock, 331.
 Ship and Pilot-boat, 330.
 Ship and Plough, 331.
 Ship and Punchbowl, 388.
 Ship and Rainbow, 331.
 Ship and Shovel, 331.
 Ship and Star, 331.
 Ship and Whale, 330.
 Ship at Anchor, 330.
 Ship Friends, 331.
 Ship in Full Sail, 330.
 Ship in Distress, 330.
 Ship in Dock, 330.
 Ship on Launch, 330.
 Shirt, 451.
 Shoe and Slap, 409.
 Shoulder of Mutton and Cat, 378.
 Shoulder of Mutton and Cucumbers, 378.
 Shovel and Sieve, 347.
 Sieve, 395.
 Silver Lion, 119.
 Simon the Tanner, 286.
 Signboard Ballads, Modern, 32, 33.
 Signboard, Heraldic, Enornities, 35.
 Signboard Poetry, 17, 18.
 Sign-Painters, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41.
 Signs, bad spelling on, 27.
 Signs temp. George II., 22, 23, 24, 25.

- Three Ravens, 202.
 Three Roses, 296.
 Three Spanish Ladies, 424.
 Three Spies, 261.
 Three Squirrels, 163.
 Three Stags, 119.
 Three Sugarloaves, 395.
 Three Swans & Peal, 166, 478.
 Three Tuns, 58, 148.
 Three Turks, 428.
 Three Washerwomen, 364.
 Three Widows, 321.
 Throstle's Nest, 177.
 Thunderstorm, 502.
 Ticket Porter, 361.
 Tiger, 152.
 Tiger's Head, 134.
 Tiltboat, 334.
 Tinker's Budget, 369.
 Tippling Philosopher, 466.
 Tobacco Plant, 252.
 Tobacco Roll & Sugarloaf, 218.
 Tobacco Rolls, 252.
 Toby Philpott, 81.
 Tom of Bedlam, 369, 370.
 Tom Sayers, 88.
 Topham, 88.
 Tower of London, 416.
 Toy, 505.
 Trafalgar, 61.
 Trap, 361.
 Traveller's Rest, 510.
 Trinity, 277.
 Triumph, 60.
 Triumphal Car, 327.
 True Briton, 415.
 True Lover's Knot, 509.
 Trumpeter, 323.
 Trunk, 394.
 Tub, 397.
 Tulip, 238.
 Tulloch Gorum, 81.
 Tully's Head, 65.
 Tumble Down Dick, 464, 465.
 Tumbling Sailors, 468.
 Tun, 474.
 Tun and Arrows, 471.
 Turk's Head, 426, 427, 428.
 Turk and Slave, 429.
 Two Black Boys, 433.
 Two Blue Flowerpots, 377.
 Two Brewers, 349.
 Two Chances, 451.
 Two Chairmen, 358.
 Two Cocks, 471.
 Two Crowns & Cushions, 102.
 Two Draymen, 349.
 Two Dutchmen, 425.
 Two Fans, 412.
 Two Flowerpots and Sundial, 377.
 Two Golden Balls, 483.
 Two Heads, 490.
 Two Jolly Brewers, 349.
 Two Pots, 389.
 Two Sawyers, 346.
 Two Smiths, 347.
 Two Sneezing Cats, 444.
 Two Spies, 261.
 Two Storks, 204.
 Two Twins, 501.
 Two White Balls, 483.
 Umbrella, 412.
 Umbrella Hospital, 413.
 Uncle Tom, 81.
 Under the Rose, 236, 237.
 Union, 100.
 Unicorn, 159, 160.
 Unicorn and Bible, 159.
 Union Arms, 136.
 Union Flag and Punchbowl, 388.
 Up and Down Post, 363.
 Valentine and Orson, 76.
 Van Dyke's Head, 82.
 Venice, 425.
 Vernon, Admiral, 57.
 Vine, 243, 244.
 Violin, Hautboy, and German Flute, 338.
 Virgil's Head, 65.
 Virgin, 272.
 Virginian, 431.
 Vulcan, 70.
 Wallace's Arms, 45.
 Walmer Castle, 417.
 Walnut-tree, 240.
 Water Tankard, 391.
 Waving Flag, 322.
 Weary Traveller, 510.
 Welch Head, 98.
 Well and Bucket, 374.
 Well with Two Buckets, 374.
 Wentworth Arms, 144.
 Wheat-sheaf, 251.
 Wheat-sheaf and Sugarloaf, 218.
 Wheel, 357.
 Wheel of Fortune, 508.
 Whip, 357.
 Whip and Egg, 357.
 White Bait, 231.
 White Bear, 93, 154, 155, 296, 416.
 White Boar, 116.
 White Dragon, 111.
 White Greyhound, 194.
 White Hart, 112, 487.
 White Hart and Fountain, 263.
 White Horse, 171, 172, 296, 327.
 White Lion, 119.
 White Puke, 494.
 Whitley Grenadier, 419.
 Whittington and his Cat, 78.
 Who'd ha' Thought it? 450.
 Widow's Struggle, 450.
 Wild Bull, 182.
 Wild Dayrell, 175.
 Wild Man, 367.
 Wild Sea, 502.
 Wilkes' Head, 63.
 William and Mary, 50.
 Willow Tree, 247.
 Wiltshire Shepherd, 419.
 Windmill, 348.
 Wolf and Lamb, 299.
 Wolfe, General, 53.
 Wolsey, Cardinal, 63.
 Woodbine, 238.
 Wooden Shoe, 410.
 Woodman, 355.
 Woolsack, 362.
 World's End, 436, 461, 462.
 World Turned Upside Down, 462.
 Wounded Heart, 300.
 Wrestlers, 484.
 Y, 476.
 Yellow Lion, 150.
 Yew Tree, 248, 475.
 Yorick's Head, 68.
 York, city of, 416, 417.
 York Minster, 417.
 Yorkshire Grey, 58, 171.
 Yorkshire Stingo, 384.
 Young Devil, 294.
 Young Man, 494.
 Z, 477.

PRICE ONE SHILLING MONTHLY.

[Annual Subscription, 12s.]

BELGRAVIA.

An Illustrated London Magazine.

The May number will contain Contributions from ALGERNON C. SWINBURNE, CHARLES READE, Mrs. E. LYNN LINTON, J. COMYNS CARR, JOSEPH KNIGHT, and other well-known writers; the continuation of Miss BRADDON'S Story, "Joshua Haggard's Daughter;" and the first chapters of a New Novel by Mrs. H. LOVETT-CAMERON. With Illustrations by VALENTINE BROMLEY, R. P. LEITCH, and others.

* * Twenty-eight volumes are already published, and may be had in cloth, full gilt, gilt edges, price 7s. 6d. each; also Cases for binding, price 2s. each.

On the 10th May will be published, with 100 Illustrations, Demy 8vo, price One Shilling.

ACADEMY NOTES FOR 1876.

EDITED BY HENRY BLACKBURN.

The great success attending the publication of Pictorial Notes of the Exhibition of the Royal Academy in 1875 has decided the Publishers to enlarge the work and make it more complete, and to continue it annually, as a permanent record of each year's Exhibition.

The Second Number of "Academy Notes" will be published almost simultaneously with the Opening of the Academy, and will contain Sketches of the Principal Pictures exhibited.

Many Artists having arranged to make their own Sketches of Pictures, it has been arranged to engrave these in facsimile, which will considerably add to the value of the work.

ASTLE ON WRITING.—THE ORIGIN AND PROGRESS OF WRITING, as well Hieroglyphic as Elementary, Illustrated by Engravings taken from Marbles, Manuscripts, and Charters, Ancient and Modern; also Some Account of the Origin and Progress of Printing. By THOMAS ASTLE, F.R.S., F.A.S., late Keeper of Records in the Tower of London. Royal 4to, half-Roxburghe, with 33 Plates (some Coloured), price £1 15s. A few Large Paper copies, roy. folio, half-Roxburghe, the Plates altogether unfolded, £3 3s. "The completest work on the subject of writing in this or any other language."

BAKER.—CLOUDS IN THE EAST: Travels and Adventures on the Perso-Turkoman Frontier. By VALENTINE BAKER. With Maps and Illustrations, coloured and plain, from Original Sketches. Demy 8vo, cloth extra, 18s.

"A man who not only thinks for himself, but has risked his life in order to gain information. . . . A most graphic and lively narrative of travels and adventures which have nothing of the commonplace about them."—Leeds Mercury.

BANKERS, A HANDBOOK OF LONDON; with some Account of their Predecessors, the Early Goldsmiths; together with Lists of Bankers, from the Earliest London Directory, printed in 1677, to that of the London Post-Office Directory of 1876. By F. G. HILTON PRICK. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 7s. 6d.

BARDSLEY'S OUR ENGLISH SURNAMES: Their Sources and Significations. By CHARLES WARING BARDSLEY, M.A. SECOND EDITION, revised throughout, considerably Enlarged, and partially rewritten. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 9s.

"Mr. Bardsley has faithfully consulted the original mediæval documents and works from which the origin and development of surnames can alone be satisfactorily traced. He has furnished a valuable contribution to the literature of surnames, and we hope to hear more of him in this field."—Times.

BEAUTIFUL PICTURES BY BRITISH ARTISTS: A Gathering of Favourites from our Picture Galleries. In Two Series. The FIRST SERIES including Examples by WILKIE, CONSTABLE, TURNER, MULREADY, LANDSEER, MACLISE, E. M. WARD, FRITH, Sir JOHN GILBERT, LESLIE, ANSDALL, MARCUS STONE, Sir NOEL PATON, FAED, EYRE CROWE, GAVIN, O'NEIL, and MADOX BROWN. The SECOND containing Pictures by ARMYTAGE, FAED, GOODALL, HEMSLEY, HORSLEY, MARKS, NICHOLLS, Sir NOEL PATON, PICKERSGILL, G. SMITH, MARCUS STONE, SOLOMON, STRAIGHT, E. M. WARD, and WARREN. All engraved on Steel in the highest style of Art. Edited, with Notices of the Artists, by SYDNEY ARMYTAGE, M.A. Price of each Series, imperial 4to, cloth extra, gilt and gilt edges, 21s. Each Volume is Complete in itself.

"This book is well got up, and good engravings by Jeens, Lumb Stocks, and others, bring back to us pictures of Royal Academy Exhibitions of past years."—Times.

BLAKE'S WORKS.—A Series of Reproductions in Facsimile of the Works of WILLIAM BLAKE, including the "Songs of Innocence and Experience," "The Book of Thel," "America," "The Vision of the Daughters of Albion," "The Marriage of Heaven and Hell," "Europe, a Prophecy," "Jerusalem," "Milton," "Urizen," "The Song of Los," &c. These Works will be issued both coloured and plain. [In preparation.]

"Blake is a real name, I assure you, and a most extraordinary man he is, if he still be living. He is the Blake whose wild designs accompany a splendid edition of Blair's 'Grave.' He paints in water-colours marvellous strange pictures—visions of his brain—which he asserts he has seen. They have great merit. I must look upon him as one of the most extraordinary persons of the age."—CHARLES LAMB.

BLANCHARD'S (Laman) POEMS. Now first Collected. Edited, with a Life of the Author (including numerous hitherto unpublished Letters from Lord LYTTON, LAMB, DICKENS, ROBERT BROWNING, and others), by BLANCHARD JERROLD. Crown 8vo, with a Vignette Portrait, cloth extra, 9s.

"His humorous verse is much of it admirable—sparkling with genuine esprit, and as polished and pointed as Præd's."—Scotsman.

BLEWITT.—THE ROSE AND THE LILY: A Story. By Mrs. OCTAVIAN BLEWITT. With a Frontispiece designed and etched by GEORGE CRUIKSHANK. Small 8vo, cloth extra, gilt, price 6s. [In the press.]

BOCCACCIO'S DECAMERON; or, Ten Days' Entertainment. Translated into English, with Introduction by THOMAS WRIGHT, Esq., M.A. F.S.A. With Portrait, and STOTHARD's beautiful Copperplates. Crown 8vo cloth extra, gilt, 7s. 6d.

BOUDOIR BALLADS: Vers de Société. By J. ASHBY STERRY. Crown 8vo, cloth extra. [In preparation]

BRAND'S OBSERVATIONS ON POPULAR ANTIQUITIES, chiefly Illustrating the Origin of our Vulgar Customs, Ceremonies, and Superstitions. With the Additions of Sir HENRY ELLIS. A New Edition, with fine full-page Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, gilt, 7s. 6d. [In the press.]

"Anyone who will read, on each respective day, the chapter which belongs to it, will, when he has got through the volume, have a better notion of what English history is than he will get from almost any other work professedly named a 'history.'"—Quarterly Review.

BRET HARTE'S CHOICE WORKS in Prose and Poetry. With Introductory Essay by J. M. BELLEW, Portrait of the Author, and 50 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 7s. 6d.

"Not many months before my friend's death, he had sent me two sketches by a young American writer (Bret Harte), far away in California ('The Outcast of Poker Flat,' and another), in which he had found such subtle strokes of character as he had not anywhere else in late years discovered; the manner resembling himself, but the matter fresh to a degree that had surprised him; the painting in all respects masterly, and the wild rude thing painted a quite wonderful reality. I have rarely known him more honestly moved."—FORSTER'S Life of Dickens.

BREWSTER'S (Sir David) MARTYRS OF SCIENCE. A New Edition, in small crown 8vo, cloth extra, gilt, with full-page Portraits, 4s. 6d.

BREWSTER'S (Sir David) MORE WORLDS THAN ONE, the Creed of the Philosopher and the Hope of the Christian. A New Edition, in small crown 8vo, cloth extra, gilt, with full-page Astronomical Plates, 4s. 6d.

"There does certainly exist a wide-spread desire to know, so far as can be known, the extent of God's living, responsible creation. The planet which we inhabit is but one vessel in the midst of a fleet sailing on through the vast ocean of space, under convoy of the sun. Far on the distant horizon what seem to be a great many other convoy ships appear, though such is their remoteness that even our best glasses enable us to know very little regarding them. But in the vessels of the same group as ourselves, we see evolutions similar to those which our own ship performs—we see them maintain relations similar to our own to the great guardian vessel in the midst—we see them regulated by her in all their movements, and that when night falls dark most of them have their sets of lanterns hoisted up to give them light; and there is a desire among us to know somewhat respecting the crews of these neighbouring vessels of ours, and whether—as we all seem bound on a common voyage—the expedition, as it is evidently under one and the same control, may not have a common purpose or object to accomplish."—HUGH MILLER.

BRIC-À-BRAC HUNTER (The); or, Chapters on Chinaman. By Major H. BYNG HALL. With Photographic Frontispiece. Crown 8vo, cloth, full gilt (from a special and novel design), 10s. 6d.

"This is a delightful book. His hints respecting marks, texture, finish, and character of various wares will be useful to amateurs. By all who are interested in chinamania will be most warmly appreciated—a very amusing and chatty volume." Standard.

BRILLAT-SAVARIN'S PHYSIOLOGY OF TASTE. A complete Translation into English, with an Introduction and explanatory Notes. Crown 8vo, cloth extra. [In the press.]

BUNYAN'S PILGRIM'S PROGRESS. Edited by Rev. T. SCOTT.

With 17 beautiful Steel Plates by STOTHARD, engraved by GOODALL; and numerous Woodcuts. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, gilt, 7s. 6d.

"The style of Bunyan is delightful to every reader, and invaluable as a study to every person who wishes to obtain a wide command over the English language. The vocabulary is the vocabulary of the common people. There is not an expression, if we except a few technical terms of theology, which would puzzle the rudest peasant. Yet no writer has said more exactly what he meant to say. For magnificence, for pathos, for vehement exhortation, for subtle disquisition, for every purpose of the poet, the orator, and the divine, this homely dialect—the dialect of plain working men—was perfectly sufficient. There is no book in our literature on which we could so readily stake the fame of the old unpolluted English language; no book which shows so well how rich that language is in its own proper wealth, and how little it has been improved by all that it has borrowed. . . . We are not afraid to say that, though there were many clever men in England during the latter half of the seventeenth century, there were only two great creative minds. One of those minds produced the 'Paradise Lost,' the other, the 'Pilgrim's Progress.'"—MACAULAY.

BYRON'S (Lord) LETTERS AND JOURNALS. With

Notices of his Life. By THOMAS MOORE. A Reprint of the Original Edition, newly revised, complete in a thick Volume of 1060 pp., with Twelve full-page Plates. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, gilt, 7s. 6d.

"We have read this book with the greatest pleasure. Considered merely as a composition, it deserves to be classed among the best specimens of English prose which our age has produced. . . . The style is agreeable, clear, and manly, and, when it rises into eloquence, rises without effort or ostentation. Nor is the matter inferior to the manner. It would be difficult to name a book which exhibits more kindness, fairness, and modesty."—MACAULAY.

ANOVA'S WORKS IN SCULPTURE AND MODEL-

LING. 150 Plates, exquisitely engraved in Outline by MOSKS, and printed on an India tint. With Descriptions by the Countess ALBRIZZI, a Biographical Memoir by CICOGNARA, and Portrait by WORTHINGTON.

A New Edition. Demy 4to, cloth extra, gilt, gilt edges, 31s. 6d.

"The fertility of this master's resources is amazing, and the manual labour expended on his works would have worn out many an ordinary workman. The outline engravings are finely executed. The descriptive notes are discriminating, and in the main exact."—Spectator.

"A very handsome volume. . . . The graceful designs of the original are rendered by the engraver with exquisite fidelity. As a gift-book, the volume deserves to be placed beside the 'Outlines' of a very kindred genius—Flaxman."—Graphic.

CARTER'S ANCIENT ARCHITECTURE OF ENGLAND.

Including the Orders during the British, Roman, Saxon, and Norman Eras; and also under the Reigns of Henry III. and Edward III. Illustrated by 103 large Copperplate Engravings, comprising upwards of Two Thousand Specimens. Edited by JOHN BRITTON. Royal folio, half-morocco extra, £3 8s.

"Mr. Carter was the first to point out to the public the right way of delineating and representing the component and detached parts of the old buildings of England. His national work on Ancient Architecture occupied him in drawing, etching, arranging, and publishing, more than twenty years. It is highly valuable."—JOHN BRITTON.

CATLIN'S ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE MANNERS, CUS-

TOMS, AND CONDITION OF THE NORTH AMERICAN INDIANS, written during Eight Years of Travel and Adventure among the Wildest and most Remarkable Tribes now existing. Containing 360 Coloured Engravings from the Author's original Paintings. Two Vols. imperial 8vo, cloth extra, gilt, the Plates beautifully printed in Colours, £3 3s.

"One of the most admirable observers of manners who ever lived among the aborigines of America."—HUMBOLDT'S Copernicus.

CATLIN'S NORTH AMERICAN INDIAN PORTFOLIO. Containing Hunting Scenes, Amusements, Scenery, and Costume of the Indians of the Rocky Mountains and Prairies of America, from Drawings and Notes made by the Author during Eight Years' Travel. A series of 31 magnificent Plates (6 now first published), beautifully coloured in facsimile of the Original Drawings exhibited at the Egyptian Hall. With Letterpress Descriptions, imperial folio, half-morocco, gilt, £7 10s.

CHAMBERLAINE'S IMITATIONS OF DRAWINGS FROM THE GREAT MASTERS in the Royal Collection. Engraved by BARTOLOZZI and others. 74 fine Plates, mostly tinted; including, in addition, "Ecce Homo," after GUIDO, and the scarce Series of 7 Anatomical Drawings. Imperial folio, half-morocco, gilt edges, £5 5s.

CLAUDE, BEAUTIES OF, containing 24 of his choicest Landscapes, beautifully Engraved on Steel, by BROMLEY, LUYTON, and others. With Biographical Sketch and Portrait. Royal folio, in a portfolio, £1 5s.

CLAUDE'S LIBER VERITATIS. A Collection of 303 Prints after the Original Designs of CLAUDE. Engraved by RICHARD EARLOM. With a descriptive Catalogue of each Print, Lists of the Persons for whom, and the Places for which, the original Pictures were first painted, and of the present Possessors of most of them. London; published by Messrs. Boydell and Co., Cheapside. Printed by W. Bulmer and Co., Cleveland Row, 1777. Three Vols. folio, half-morocco extra, gilt edges, £10 10s.

COLLINS' (WILKIE) NEW NOVEL.—THE TWO DESTINIES: A Romance. By WILKIE COLLINS, Author of "The Woman in White," &c. For WILKIE COLLINS' other Works, see "Piccadilly Novels." [Shortly.]

COLMAN'S HUMOROUS WORKS.—Broad Grins, My Nightgown and Slippers, and other Humorous Works, Prose and Poetical, of GEORGE COLMAN. With Life and Anecdotes by G. B. BUCKSTONE, and Frontispiece by HOGARTH. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, gilt, 7s. 6d.

"What antic have we here, in motley livery of red and yellow, with cap on head, and dagger of lath in hand? It is the king's jester, a professed droll, strangely gifted in all grimace, who pulls faces, and sells grins by the yard. For the impudent joke he has scarcely an equal."—Westminster Review.

CONEY'S ENGRAVINGS OF ANCIENT CATHEDRALS, Hôtels de Ville, Town Halls, &c., including some of the finest Examples of Gothic Architecture in France, Holland, Germany, and Italy. 32 large Plates, imperial folio, half-morocco extra, £3 13s. 6d.

CONSTABLE'S GRAPHIC WORKS. Comprising 40 highly finished Mezzotinto Engravings on Steel, by DAVID LUCAS; with descriptive Letterpress by C. R. LESLIE, R.A. Folio, half-morocco, gilt edges, £2 2s.

COTMAN'S ENGRAVINGS OF THE SEPULCHRAL BRASSES IN NORFOLK AND SUFFOLK. With Letterpress Descriptions, an Essay on Sepulchral Memorials by DAWSON TURNER, Notes by SIR SAMUEL MEYRICK, ALBERT WAY, and SIR HARRIS NICOLAS, and copious Index. New Edition, containing 173 Plates, two of them Illuminated. Two Volumes, small folio, half-morocco extra, £6 6s.

"Cotman's work on Sepulchral Brasses is by far the most important work on the subject."—DAWSON TURNER.

COTMAN'S ETCHINGS OF ARCHITECTURAL REMAINS, chiefly Norman and Gothic, in various Counties in England, but principally in Norfolk, with Descriptive Notices by DAWSON TURNER, and Architectural Observations by THOMAS RICKMAN. Two Vols. imperial folio, containing 240 spirited Etchings, half-morocco, top edges gilt, £3 8s.

COTMAN'S LIBER STUDIORUM. A Series of Landscape Studies and Original Compositions, for the Use of Art Students, consisting of 48 Etchings, the greater part executed in "soft ground." Imperial folio, half-morocco, £1 11s. 6d.

CREASY.—MEMOIRS OF EMINENT ETONIANS; with Notices of the Early History of Eton College. By Sir EDWARD CREASY, Author of "The Fifteen Decisive Battles of the World." A New Edition, brought down to the Present Time, with 13 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, gilt, 7s. 6d.
 "A new edition of Creasy's Etonians will be welcome. The book was a favourite a quarter of a century ago, and it has maintained its reputation. The value of this new edition is enhanced by the fact that Sir Edward Creasy has added to it several memoirs of Etonians who have died since the first edition appeared. The work is eminently interesting."—Scotsman.

CRUIKSHANK'S COMIC ALMANACK. Complete in Two SERIES: The First from 1835 to 1843; the SECOND from 1844 to 1853. A Gathering of the BEST HUMOUR OF THACKERAY, HOOD, MAYHEW, ALBERT SMITH, A BECKETT, ROBERT BROUGH, &c. With 2000 Woodcuts and Steel Engravings by CRUIKSHANK, HINE, LANDELLS, &c. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, two very thick volumes, 15s.; or, separately, 7s. 6d. per volume.

CUSSANS' HANDBOOK OF HERALDRY. With Instructions for Tracing Pedigrees and Deciphering Ancient MSS.; Rules for the Appointment of Liveries, Chapters on Continental and American Heraldry, &c. &c. By JOHN E. CUSSANS. Illustrated with 360 Plates and Woodcuts. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, gilt and emblazoned, 7s. 6d.

CUSSANS' HISTORY OF HERTFORDSHIRE. A County History, got up in a very superior manner, and ranging with the finest works of its class. By JOHN E. CUSSANS. Illustrated with full-page Plates on Copper and Stone, and a profusion of small Woodcuts. Parts I. to X. now ready, 21s. each.

"The amount of labour Mr. Cussans bestows to obtain original information is immense; his anxiety for accuracy is intense, and the painstaking care with which he investigates statements and peruses old documents is remarkable. The result of his industry is a work abounding in new and curious information. It differs from 'Clutterbuck' in this respect, that whereas that well-patronised and expensive book had most care and attention bestowed on the first volume—(that part of Hertfordshire where the author resided)—each successive portion of Mr. Cussans' history is manifestly an improvement on the earlier portions. Nothing can ever repay the author for the very great care, pains, and time he has devoted to this work, which must have been truly a labour of love to him; but he has sure reward in the esteem of those who can appreciate aright earnestness, diligence, and perseverance in the accomplishment of a useful and valuable object."—Herts Guardian.

CYCLOPÆDIA OF COSTUME; or, A Dictionary of Dress—Regal, Ecclesiastical, Civil, and Military—from the Earliest Period in England to the reign of George the Third. Including Notices of Contemporaneous Fashions on the Continent, and preceded by a General History of the Costumes of the Principal Countries of Europe. By J. R. PLANCHÉ, Somerset Herald. To be Completed in Twenty-four Parts, quarto, at Five Shillings each, profusely illustrated by Coloured and Plain Plates and Wood Engravings.—A Prospectus will be sent upon application.

(In course of publication.)

"There is no subject connected with dress with which 'Somerset Herald' is not as familiar as ordinary men are with the ordinary themes of everyday life. The gathered knowledge of many years is placed before the world in this his latest work, and, when finished, there will exist no work on the subject half so valuable. The numerous illustrations are all effective—for their accuracy the author is responsible; they are well drawn and well engraved, and, while indispensable to a proper comprehension of the text, are satisfactory as works of art."—Art Journal.

"These numbers of a Cyclopædia of Ancient and Modern Costume give promise that the work, when complete, will be one of the most perfect works ever published upon the subject. The illustrations are numerous and excellent, and would, even without the letterpress, render the work an invaluable book of reference for information as to costumes for fancy balls and character quadrilles. . . . Beautifully printed and superbly illustrated."—Standard.

"Those who know how useful is Fairholt's brief and necessarily imperfect glossary will be able to appreciate the much greater advantages promised by Mr. Planché's book."—Athenæum.

CHATTO & WINDUS, PICCADILLY.

DEBDIN'S (T. F.) BIBLIOMANIA; or, Book-Madness: A Bibliographical Romance. With numerous Illustrations. A New Edition, with a Supplement, including a Key to the Assumed Characters in the Drama. Demy 8vo, half-Roxburghe, 21s.; a few Large Paper copies, half-Roxburghe, the edges altogether uncut, at 42s.

"I have not yet recovered from the delightful delirium into which your 'Bibliomania' has completely thrown me. Your book, to my taste, is one of the most extraordinary gratifications I have enjoyed for many years."—ISAAC DISRAELI.

DEMOCRACY (THE). A Novel. By WHYTE THORNE. Three Vols., crown 8vo, 31s. 6d.

"It is always difficult for any one not personally concerned in English politics to write about them without making serious blunders, and even Mr. Trollope has not always succeeded in avoiding mistakes; but the author of the novel before us keeps clear of error, and writes pleasantly enough."—Athenæum.

DIXON.—WHITE CONQUEST: AMERICA IN 1875. By W. HEPPWORTH DIXON. Two Vols. 8vo, cloth extra, 30s.

"The best written, most instructive, and most entertaining book that Mr. Dixon has published since 'New America.'"—Athenæum.

DRURY'S ILLUSTRATIONS OF FOREIGN ENTOMOLOGY.

Containing, in 150 beautifully Coloured Plates, upwards of 600 Exotic Insects of the East and West Indies, China, New Holland, North and South America, Germany, &c. With important Additions and Scientific Indexes, by J. O. WESTWOOD, F.L.S. Three Vols. 4to, half-morocco extra, £5 5s.

"Drury's work has not been surpassed in beauty and accuracy of execution by any of the sumptuous efforts of the present day."—Encyclopædia Britannica.

DUNRAVEN'S (Earl of) THE GREAT DIVIDE: A Narrative of Travels in the Upper Yellowstone in the Summer of 1874. With Maps and numerous striking full-page Illustrations by VALENTINE W. BROMLEY. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 18s.

"There has not for a long time appeared a better book of travel than Lord Dunraven's 'The Great Divide.' . . . The book is full of clever observation, and both narrative and illustrations are thoroughly good."—Athenæum.

"A jolly, rollicking narrative of adventure and sport, mixed up with a great deal of useful information concerning one of the most interesting regions in the American continent."—Nature.

EARLY ENGLISH POETS. Edited, with Introductions and copious Notes, by Rev. A. B. GROSART. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 6s. per Volume; a few Large Paper copies (only 50 printed), at 12s. per Vol.

"Mr. Grosart has spent the most laborious and the most enthusiastic care on the perfect restoration and preservation of the text; and it is very unlikely that any other edition of the poet can ever be called for. . . . From Mr. Grosart we always expect and always receive the final results of most patient and competent scholarship."—Examiner.

1. Fletcher's (Giles B. D.) Complete Poems, Christ's Victorie in Heaven, Christ's Victorie on Earth, Christ's Triumph over Death, and Minor Poems. With Memorial-Introduction and Notes.

2. Davies' (Sir John) Complete Poetical Works, including Psalms I. to L. in Verse, and other hitherto unpublished MSS., for the first time Collected and Edited. With Memorial-Introduction and Notes. Two Vols.

3. Herriek's (Robert) Hesperides, Noble Numbers, and Complete Collected Poems. With Notes, Introductory Memoir, and Facsimile Portrait, Index of First Lines, and Glossary. Three Vols. [In the press].

4. Sidney's (Sir Philip) Complete Poetical Works, including the Songs and Sonnets, Astrophel and Stella, the May Lady, &c. With Memorial-Introduction and copious Notes. [In preparation].

5. Donne's (John) Complete Poetical Works, including the Poems on Several Occasions, the Satyrs, Polydoran, &c. With Introductory Memoir and copious Explanatory Notes. [In preparation].

* Other volumes are in active preparation.

EMANUEL ON DIAMONDS AND PRECIOUS STONES; Their History, Value, and Properties; with Simple Tests for ascertaining their Reality. By HARRY EMANUEL, F.R.G.S. With numerous Illustrations, Tinted and Plain. A New Edition, crown 8vo, cloth extra, gilt, 6s.

EMERSON'S NEW WORK.—LETTERS & SOCIAL AIMS.

By RALPH WALDO EMERSON. Second Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 7s. 6d.

"His method of work is that of great thinkers. Gradually he absorbs and assimilates whatever science or history can furnish, and slowly and reflectively he gives us the result of his thoughts."—Athenæum.

"Will be eagerly welcomed by his numerous admirers on both sides of the Atlantic. . . . These latest essays and lectures of the American sage contain the matured fruits of earnest and deep thought wrapt up in language always clear and incisive, often happily epigrammatic. They present the author's ripest opinions on literature and society. Every part of the work breathes the free air which belongs to a free country, and is redolent of hope and youth. The happy knack which Emerson always possessed of illustrating his meaning by apposite anecdotes has not failed him in his old age; and in these pages light is often flashed upon an obscure or abstruse proposition from a pithy and pointed story. Without any pedantic show of learning, every page bears witness to the author's wide, one might almost say encycloædic, acquaintance with the literature of all ages and of all races. Not only has Emerson been a great reader, but he has, so to speak, got at the very innermost core of the books which he has devoured."—Scotsman.

ENGLISH GENTLEMAN'S LIBRARY. Demy 8vo, cloth extra (uniform binding), Illustrated:—

D'Arblay's (Madame) Diary and Letters. Edited by her Niece, CHARLOTTE BARRETT. A New Edition, illustrated by numerous fine Portraits engraved on Steel. Four Vols. 8vo., cloth extra, 36s.

Grammont (Count), Memoirs of. By ANTHONY HAMILTON. A New Edition, with a Biographical Sketch of Count Hamilton, numerous Historical and Illustrative Notes by Sir WALTER SCOTT, and 64 Copperplate Portraits by EDWARD SCRIVEN. 8vo, cloth extra, 15s.

Maxwell's Life of the Duke of Wellington. Three Vols. 8vo, with numerous highly finished Line and Wood Engravings by Eminent Artists. Cloth extra, gilt, £1 7s.

Montagu's (Lady Mary Wortley) Letters and Works. Edited by Lord WHARNCLIFFE. With important Additions and Corrections, derived from the Original Manuscripts, and a New Memoir. Two Vols. 8vo, with fine Steel Portraits, cloth extra, 18s.

Roscoe's Life of Lorenzo de' Medici, called "THE MAGNIFICENT." A New and much improved Edition. Edited by his Son, THOMAS ROSCOE. Demy 8vo, with Portraits and numerous Plates, cloth extra, 9s.

Roscoe's Life and Pontificate of Leo the Tenth. Edited by his Son, THOMAS ROSCOE. Two Vols. 8vo, with Portraits and numerous Plates cloth extra, 18s.

Saint-Simon (Memoirs of the Duke of), during the Reign of Louis the Fourteenth and the Regency. Translated from the French and Edited by BAYLE ST. JOHN. A New Edition. Three Vols. 8vo., cloth extra, 27s.

Walpole's (Horace) Anecdotes of Painting in England. With some Account of the principal English Artists, and incidental Notices of Sculptors, Carvers, Enamellers, Architects, Medallists, Engravers, &c. With Additions by Rev. JAMES DALLAWAY. Edited, with Additional Notes, by RALPH N. WORNUM. Three Vols. 8vo, with upwards of 150 Portraits and Plates, cloth extra, £1 7s.

Walpole's (Horace) entire Correspondence. Chronologically arranged, with the Prefaces and Notes of CROKER, Lord DOVER, and others; the Notes of all previous Editors, and Additional Notes by PETER CUNNINGHAM. Nine Vols. 8vo, with numerous fine Portraits engraved on Steel, cloth extra, £4 1s.

Walpole's (Horace) Royal and Noble Authors of England, Scotland, and Ireland; with Lists of their Works. A New Edition, Annotated, considerably Enlarged, and brought down to the Present Time. Illustrated by nearly 200 Copperplate Portraits. Six Vols. 8vo, cloth extra. [In preparation.]

ENGLISHMAN'S HOUSE (The): A Practical Guide to all interested in Selecting or Building a House, with full Estimates of Cost, Quantities, &c. By C. J. RICHARDSON. Third Edition. With nearly 600 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 7s. 6d.

FAIRHOLT.—TOBACCO: Its History and Associations; including an Account of the Plant and its Manufacture; with its Modes of Use in all Ages and Countries. By F. W. FAIRHOLT, F.S.A. A New Edition, with Coloured Frontispiece and upwards of 100 Illustrations by the Author. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 6s.

"A very pleasant and instructive history of tobacco and its associations, which we cordially recommend alike to the votaries and to the enemies of the much-maligned but certainly not neglected weed. . . . Full of interest and information."—Daily News.

"A delightful reprint. . . . A more complete and dainty book on a subject which some still think unsavoury it would not be easy to call to mind."—Graphic.

FARADAY'S CHEMICAL HISTORY OF A CANDLE. Lectures delivered to a Juvenile Audience. A New Edition, Edited by W. CROOKES, Esq., F.C.S., &c. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, with numerous Illustrations, 4s. 6d.

FARADAY'S VARIOUS FORCES OF NATURE. A New Edition, Edited by W. CROOKES, Esq., F.C.S., &c. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, with numerous Illustrations, 4s. 6d.

"For many years the English public had the privilege of listening to the discourses and speculations of Professor Faraday, at the Royal Institution, on Matter and Forces; and it is not too much to say that no lecturer on Physical Science, since the time of Sir Humphry Davy, was ever listened to with more delight. The pleasure which all derived from the expositions of Faraday was of a somewhat different kind from that produced by any other philosopher whose lectures we have attended. It was partially derived from his extreme dexterity as an operator: with him we had no chance of apologies for an unsuccessful experiment—no hanging fire in the midst of a series of brilliant demonstrations, producing that depressing tendency akin to the pain felt by an audience at a false note from a vocalist. All was a sparkling stream of eloquence and experimental illustration. We would have defied a chemist loving his science, no matter how often he might himself have repeated an experiment, to feel uninterested when seeing it done by Faraday."—W. CROOKES.

FIGUIER'S PRIMITIVE MAN: A Popular Manual of the prevailing Theories of the Descent of Man as promulgated by DARWIN, LYELL, Sir JOHN LUBBOCK, HUXLEY, E. B. TYLOR, and other eminent Ethnologists. Translated from the last French edition, and revised by E. B. T. With 263 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth extra, gilt, 9s.

"An interesting and essentially popular resumé of all that has been written on the subject. M. Figuiér has collected together the evidences which modern researches have accumulated, and has done this with a considerable amount of care. He endeavours to separate the inquiry respecting Primitive Man from the Mosaic account of Man's creation, and does not admit that the authority of Holy Writ is in any way questioned by those labours which aim at seeking the real epoch of Man's first appearance upon earth. . . . An interesting book, with 263 illustrations, of which thirty are full-page engravings, confessedly somewhat fanciful in their combinations, but which will be found on examination to be justified by that soundest evidence, the actual discovery of the objects of which they represent the use."—Athenæum.

FINGER-RING LORE: Historical, Legendary, and Anecdotal. Earliest Notices; Superstitions; Ring Investiture, Secular and Ecclesiastical; Betrothal and Wedding Rings; Ring-tokens; Memorial and Mortuary Rings; Posy-Rings; Customs and Incidents in Connection with Rings; Remarkable Rings, &c. &c. By WILLIAM JONES, F.S.A. With Hundreds of Illustrations of Curious Rings of all Ages and Countries. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 7s. 6d. [In the press.]

GILL AND GANDY'S POMPEIANA; or, The Topography, Edifices, and Ornaments of Pompeii. With upwards of 100 Line Engravings by GOODALL, COOKE, HEATH, PYE, &c. Demy 8vo, cloth extra, gilt, 18s.

GEMS OF ART: A Collection of 36 Engravings, after Paintings by REMBRANDT, CUIP, REYNOLDS, POUSSIN, MURILLO, TENIERS, CORREGGIO, GAINSBOROUGH, NORTHCOLE, &c., executed in Mezzotint by TURNER, BROMLEY, &c. Folio, in Portfolio, £1 11s. 6d.

GILBERT (W. S.), ORIGINAL PLAYS by: "A Wicked World," "Charity," "Palace of Truth," "Pygmalion," "Trial by Jury," &c. One Vol. crown 8vo, cloth extra, 9s.

"His workmanship is in its way perfect; it is very sound, very even, very well sustained, and excellently balanced throughout."—Observer.

"A book which not only the modern playgoer, but those who do not frequent the theatre, can read with equal pleasure."—Era.

"Mr. Gilbert has done well and wisely to publish in a collected form some of his best plays. The Palace of Truth and Pygmalion may be read and enjoyed as poems by persons who have never entered the walls of a theatre."—Standard.

GILLRAY'S CARICATURES. Printed from the Original Plates, all engraved by Himself between 1779 and 1810; comprising the best Political and Humorous Satires of the Reign of GEORGE THE THIRD, in upwards of 600 highly spirited Engravings. Atlas folio, half-morocco extra, gilt edges, £7 10s.—There is also a Volume of SUPPRESSED PLATES, atlas folio, half-morocco, 31s. 6d.—Also, a VOLUME OF LETTERPRESS DESCRIPTIONS, comprising a very amusing Political History of the Reign of GEORGE THE THIRD, by THOS. WRIGHT and R. H. EVANS. Demy 8vo, cloth extra, 15s.; or half-morocco, £1 1s.

GILLRAY, THE CARICATURIST: The Story of his Life and Times, and Anecdotal Descriptions of his Engravings. Edited by THOMAS WRIGHT, Esq., M.A., F.S.A. With 83 full-page Plates, and numerous Wood Engravings. Demy 4to, 600 pages, cloth extra, 31s. 6d.

"High as the expectations excited by this description [in the Introduction] may be, they will not be disappointed. The most inquisitive or exacting reader will find ready gathered to his hand, without the trouble of reference, almost every scrap of narrative, anecdote, gossip, scandal, or epigram, in poetry or prose, that he can possibly require for the elucidation of the caricatures."—Quarterly Review.

GOSSE (Edmund W.)—KING ERIK: A Tragedy. With a Vignette by W. B. SCOTT. Small 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s.

"The author's book, On Viol and Flute, displayed such a remarkable ear for music, such a singular poetic interpretation of flowers and trees, and such-like children of Flora, and, above all, such a distinct and individual poetic savour, that it would have been a pity indeed had these good gifts been wasted in any wrong direction. In this case there is happily no cause for such pity. We have seldom seen so marked an advance in a second book beyond a first. . . . The faults of King Erik are but slight matters; its merits are solid, and of a very high order."—Academy.

GOSSE (Edmund W.)—ON VIOL AND FLUTE. Second Edition. With a Vignette by W. B. SCOTT. Small 8vo, cloth gilt, 5s.

GREENWOOD'S NEW NOVEL.—DICK TEMPLE. By JAMES GREENWOOD. Three Vols. crown 8vo, 31s. 6d. [In the press.]

GREENWOOD'S (James) LOW-LIFE DEEPS: An Account of the Strange Fish to be found there; including "The Man and Dog Fight," with much additional and confirmatory evidence; "With a Tally-Man," "A Fallen Star," "The Betting Barber," "A Coal Marriage," &c. With Illustrations in tint by ALFRED CONANEN. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, gilt, 7s. 6d.

"The book is interesting reading. It shows that there are many things in London life not dreamt of by most people. It is well got up, and contains a number of striking illustrations."—Scotsman.

GREENWOOD'S WILDS OF LONDON; Descriptive Sketches, from Personal Observations and Experience of Remarkable Scenes, People, and Places in London. By JAMES GREENWOOD, the "Lambeth Casual." With 12 Tinted Illustrations by ALFRED CONCANEN. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, gilt, 7s. 6d.
 "Mr. James Greenwood presents himself once more in the character of 'one whose delight it is to do his humble endeavour towards exposing and extirpating social abuses and those hole-and-corner evils which afflict society.'"—Saturday Review.

GOLDEN LIBRARY. Square 16mo (Tauchnitz size), cloth extra, price 2s. per Volume.

Book of Clerical Anecdotes:
 The Humours and Eccentricities of "the Cloth."

Byron's Don Juan.

Carlyle (Thomas) on the Choice of Books. With a Memoir. [1s. 6d.]

Godwin's (William) Lives of the Necromancers.

Holmes's Autoocrat of the Breakfast Table. With an Introduction
 by GEORGE AUGUSTUS SALA.

Holmes's Professor at the Breakfast Table.

Hood's Whims and Oddities.
 Both Series Complete in One Volume, with all the original Illustrations.

Irving's (Washington) Tales of a Traveller.

Irving's (Washington) Tales of the Alhambra.

Jesse's (Edward) Scenes and Occupations of Country Life; with Recollections of Natural History.

Lamb's Essays of Elia. Both
 Series Complete in One Vol.

Leigh Hunt's Essays: A Tale
 for a Chimney Corner, and other Pieces.
 With Portrait, and Introduction by EDMUND OLLIER.

"A series of excellently printed and carefully annotated volumes, handy in size, and altogether attractive."—Bookseller.

GOLDEN TREASURY OF THOUGHT. An Encyclopædia of Quotations from Writers of all Times and all Countries. Selected and Edited by THEODORE TAYLOR. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, and gilt edges, 7s. 6d.

GRIMM.—GERMAN POPULAR STORIES. Collected by the Brothers GRIMM, and Translated by EDGAR TAYLOR. Edited, with an Introduction, by JOHN RUSKIN. With 22 Illustrations after the inimitable designs of GEORGE CRUIKSHANK. Both Series Complete. Square crown 8vo, 6s. 6d.; gilt leaves, 7s. 6d.

"The illustrations of this volume . . . are of quite sterling and admirable art, of a class precisely parallel in elevation to the character of the tales which they illustrate; and the original etchings, as I have before said in the Appendix to my 'Elements of Drawing,' were unrivalled in masterfulness of touch since Rembrandt (in some qualities of delineation, unrivalled even by him). . . . To make somewhat enlarged copies of them, looking at them through a magnifying glass, and never putting two lines where Cruikshank has put only one, would be an exercise in decision and severe drawing which would leave afterwards little to be learnt in schools."—Extract from Introduction by JOHN RUSKIN.

Mallory's (Sir Thomas) Mort
 D'Arthur: The Stories of King Arthur and of the Knights of the Round Table. Edited by B. M. RANKING.

Pascal's Provincial Letters. A
 New Translation, with Historical Introduction and Notes, by T.
 M'CRIE, D.D., LL.D.

Pope's Complete Poetical
 Works.

Rochevoucauld's Maxims and Moral Reflections. With Notes, and an Introductory Essay by SAINTE-BEUVE.

St. Pierre's Paul and Virginia, and the Indian Cottage. Edited, with Life, by the Rev. E. CLARKE.

Shelley's Early Poems and Queen Mab, with Essay by LEIGH
 HUNT.

Shelley's Later Poems: Laon
 and Cythna, &c.

Shelley's Posthumous Poems,
 the Shelley Papers, &c.

Shelley's Prose Works, including a Refutation of Deism, Zastrozzi,
 St. Irvyne, &c.

White's Natural History of Selborne. Edited, with additions, by THOMAS BROWN, F.L.S.

GUYOT'S EARTH AND MAN; or, Physical Geography in its Relation to the History of Mankind. With Additions by Professors AGASSIZ, PIERCE, and GRAY. With 12 Maps and Engravings on Steel, some Coloured, and a copious Index. A New Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, gilt, 4s. 6d.

AKE'S (T. GORDON) NEW SYMBOLS: Poems. By the Author of "Parables and Tales." Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 6s.

"The entire book breathes a pure and ennobling influence, shows welcome originality of idea and illustration, and yields the highest proof of imaginative faculty and mature power of expression."—Athenæum.

HALL'S (Mrs. S. C.) SKETCHES OF IRISH CHARACTER.

With numerous Illustrations on Steel and Wood, by DANIEL MACLISE, Sir JOHN GILBERT, W. HARVEY, and G. CRUIKSHANK. 8vo, cloth extra, gilt, 7s. 6d.

"The Irish sketches of this lady resemble Miss Mitford's beautiful English Sketches in 'Our Village,' but they are far more vigorous and picturesque and bright."—Blackwood's Magazine.

HARRIS'S AURELIAN: A Natural History of English Moths and Butterflies, and the Plants on which they feed. A New Edition. Edited, with Additions, by J. O. WESTWOOD. With about 400 exquisitely Coloured Figures of Moths, Butterflies, Caterpillars, &c., and the Plants on which they feed. Small folio, half-morocco extra, gilt edges, £3 13s. 6d.

HAWKER (MEMORIALS OF THE LATE REV. ROBERT

STEPHEN), sometime Vicar of Morwenstow, in the Diocese of Exeter. Collected, arranged, and edited by the Rev. FREDERICK GEORGE LEE, D.C.L., Vicar of All Saints', Lambeth. With Photographic Portrait, Pedigree, and Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth extra, 12s.

"Dr. Lee's 'Memorials' is a far better record of Mr. Hawker, and gives a more reverent and more true idea of the man. . . Dr. Lee rightly confines himself to his proper subject."—Athenæum.

HAYDON'S (B. R.) CORRESPONDENCE & TABLE-TALK.

With a Memoir by his Son, FREDERIC WORDSWORTH HAYDON. Comprising a large number of hitherto Unpublished Letters from KEATS, WILKIE, SOUTHEY, WORDSWORTH, KIRKUP, LEIGH HUNT, LANDSEER, HORACE SMITH, Sir G. BEAUMONT, GOETHE, Mrs. SIDDONS, Sir WALTER SCOTT, TALFOURD, JEFFREY, Miss MITFORD, MACREADY, Mrs. BROWNING, LOCKHART, HALLAM, and others. With 23 Illustrations, including Facsimiles of many interesting Sketches, Portraits of HAYDON by KEATS and WILKIE, and HAYDON'S Portraits of WILKIE, KEATS, and MARIA FOOTE. Two Vols., 8vo, cloth extra, 36s.

"As a defence of the painter's character and career the work before us will possibly meet with as much criticism as approval; but there can, we think, be no question of its interest in a purely biographical sense, or of its literary merit. The letters and table-talk form in themselves a most valuable contribution to the social and artistic history of the time, and would be very welcome even without the memoir which precedes them."—Fall Mall Gazette.

"The volumes are among the most interesting produced or likely to be produced by the present season."—Examiner.

"One of the most moving histories that has been published in modern days. . . Haydon's case has never before been fairly laid before the public; the man has never been shown as he was in truth, through the medium of his correspondence, his diaries, sayings and actions. . . Charming correspondence, and still more charming table-talk."—Morning Post.

"Here we have a full-length portrait of a most remarkable man. . . His son has done the work well—is clear and discriminating on the whole, and writes with ease and vigour. Over and above the interest that must be felt in Haydon himself, the letters afford us the opportunity of studying closely many of the greatest men and women of the time. . . We do not hesitate to say that these letters and table-talk form a most valuable contribution to the history of art and literature in the past generation. The editor has selected and arranged them with uncommon judgment, adding many notes that contain ana and anecdotes. Every page has thus its point of interest. The book will no doubt have a wide audience, as it well deserves."—Nonconformist.

HOOD'S (Tom) HUMOROUS WORKS. Edited, with a Memoir, by his Sister, FRANCES FREELING BRODERIP. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, with numerous Illustrations, 6s. [In the press.]

HOOD'S (Tom) FROM NOWHERE TO THE NORTH POLE: A Noah's Arkæological Narrative. By TOM HOOD. With 25 Illustrations by W. BRUNTON and E. C. BARNES. Square crown 8vo, in a handsome and specially-designed binding, gilt edges, 6s.

"Poor Tom Hood! It is very sad to turn over the droll pages of 'From Nowhere to the North Pole,' and to think that he will never make the young people, for whom, like his famous father, he ever had such a kind, sympathetic heart, laugh or cry any more. This is a birthday story, and no part of it is better than the first chapter, concerning birthdays in general, and Frank's birthday in particular. The amusing letterpress is profusely interspersed with the jingling rhymes which children love and learn so easily. Messrs. Brunton and Barnes do full justice to the writer's meaning, and a pleasant result of the harmonious co-operation of author and artist could not be desired."—Times.

HONE'S SCRAP-BOOKS: The Miscellaneous Collections of WILLIAM HONE, Author of "The Table-Book," "Every-Day Book," and "Year-Book": being a Supplement to those works. With Notes, Portraits, and numerous Illustrations of curious and eccentric objects. Crown 8vo. [In preparation.]

"He has deserved well of the naturalist, the antiquarian, and the poet."—CHRISTOPHER NORTH.

HOOK'S (THEODORE) CHOICE HUMOROUS WORKS, including his Ludicrous Adventures, Bons-mots, Puns, and Hoaxes. With a new Life of the Author, Portraits, Facsimiles, and Illust. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, gilt 7s. 6d.

"His name will be preserved. His political songs and jeux d'esprit, when the hour comes for collecting them, will form a volume of sterling and lasting attraction; and after many clever romances of this age shall have sufficiently occupied public attention, and sunk, like hundreds of former generations, into utter oblivion, there are tales in his collection which will be read with even a greater interest than they commanded in their novelty."—J. G. LOCKHART.

HOPE'S COSTUME OF THE ANCIENTS. Illustrated in upwards of 320 Outline Engravings, containing Representations of Egyptian, Greek, and Roman Habits and Dresses. A New Edition. Two Vols., royal 8vo, with Coloured Frontispieces, cloth extra, £2 5s.

"The substance of many expensive works, containing all that may be necessary to give to artists, and even to dramatic performers and to others engaged in classical representations, an idea of ancient costumes sufficiently ample to prevent their offending in their performances by gross and obvious blunders."

HORNE.—ORION. An Epic Poem, in Three Books. By RICHARD HENGIST HORNE. With Photographic Portrait. TENTH EDITION. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 7s.

"Orion will be admitted, by every man of genius, to be one of the noblest, if not the very noblest poetical work of the age. Its defects are trivial and conventional, its beauties intrinsic and supreme."—EDGAR ALLAN POE.

ITALIAN MASTERS (DRAWINGS BY THE): Autotype Facsimiles of Original Drawings. With Critical and Descriptive Notes, Biographical and Artistic, by J. COMYNS CARR. Atlas folio, half-morocco, gilt. [In preparation.]

LAMB (Mary and Charles) : THEIR POEMS, LETTERS, and REMAINS. With Reminiscences and Notes by W. CARW HAZLITT. With HANCOCK's Portrait of the Essayist, Facsimiles of the Title-pages of the rare First Editions of Lamb's and Coleridge's Works, and numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 10s. 6d.

"Must be consulted by all future biographers of the Lambs."—Daily News.

"Very many passages will delight those fond of literary trifles; hardly any portion will fail in interest for lovers of Charles Lamb and his sister."—Standard.

LANDSEER'S (Sir Edwin) ETCHINGS OF CARNIVOROUS ANIMALS. Comprising 38 subjects, chiefly Early Works, etched by his Brother THOMAS or his Father, with Letterpress Descriptions. Royal 4to, cloth extra, 15s.

LAMONT.—YACHTING IN THE ARCTIC SEAS; or, Notes of Five Voyages of Sport and Discovery in the Neighbourhood of Spitzbergen and Novaya Zemlya. By JAMES LAMONT, F.G.S., F.R.G.S. Author of "Seasons with the Sea-Horses." Edited, with numerous full-page Illustrations, by WILLIAM LIVESAY, M.D. Demy 8vo, cloth extra, with Maps and numerous Illustrations, 18s.

"After wading through numberless volumes of icy fiction, concocted narrative, and spurious biography of Arctic voyagers, it is pleasant to meet with a real and genuine volume. . . . He shows much tact in recounting his adventures, and they are so interspersed with anecdotes and information as to make them anything but wearisome. . . . The book, as a whole, is the most important addition made to our Arctic literature for a long time."—Athenaeum.

"Full of entertainment and information."—Nature.

"Mr. Lamont has taken a share distinctively his own in the work of Arctic discovery, and the value of his labours as an 'amateur explorer' is to be attributed to the systematic manner in which he pursued his investigations, no less than to his scientific qualifications for the task. . . . The handsome volume is full of valuable and interesting information to the sportsman and naturalist—it would be difficult to say which of the two will enjoy it most."—Scotsman.

LEE (General Robert) : HIS LIFE AND CAMPAIGNS. By his Nephew, EDWARD LEE CHILDE. With Steel-plate Portrait by JEENS, and a Map. Post 8vo, 9s.

"A valuable and well-written contribution to the history of the Civil War in the United States."—Saturday Review.

"As a clear and compendious survey of a life of the true heroic type, Mr. Childe's volume may well be commended to the English reader."—Graphic.

LIFE IN LONDON; or, The Day and Night Scenes of Jerry Hawthorn and Corinthian Tom. With the whole of Cruikshank's very Droll Illustrations, in Colours, after the Originals. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, gilt, 7s. 6d.

LINTON'S (Mrs. E. Lynn) JOSHUA DAVIDSON, Christian and Communist. SIXTH EDITION, with a New Preface. Small crown 8vo, cloth extra, 4s. 6d.

"In a short and vigorous preface, Mrs. Linton defends her notion of the logical outcome of Christianity as embodied in this attempt to conceive how Christ would have acted, with whom He would have fraternised, and who would have declined to receive Him, had He appeared in the present generation."—Examiner.

LOST BEAUTIES OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE. An Appeal to Authors, Poets, Clergymen, and Public Speakers. By CHARLES MACKAY, LL.D. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 6s. 6d.

MARSTON'S (Dr. Westland) DRAMATIC and POETICAL WORKS. Collected Library Edition, in Two Vols. crown 8vo, 18s.

"'The Patrician's Daughter' is an oasis in the desert of modern dramatic literature, a real emanation of mind. We do not recollect any modern work in which states of thought are so freely developed, except the 'Torquato Tasso' of Goethe. The play is a work of art in the same sense that a play of Sophocles is a work of art; it is one simple idea in a state of gradual development.....The 'Favourite of Fortune' is one of the most important additions to the stock of English prose comedy that has been made during the present century."—Times.

MARSTON'S (Philip Bourke) SONG TIDE, and other Poems. Second Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 8s.

"This is a first work of extraordinary performance and of still more extraordinary promise. The youngest school of English poetry has received an important accession to its ranks in Philip Bourke Marston."—Examiner.

MARSTON'S (P. B.) ALL IN ALL: Poems and Sonnets. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 8s.

"Many of these poems are leavened with the leaven of genuine poetical sentiment, and expressed with grace and beauty of language. A tender melancholy, as well as a penetrating pathos, gives character to much of their sentiment, and lends it an irresistible interest to all who can feel."—Standard.

MEYRICK'S PAINTED ILLUSTRATIONS OF ANCIENT

ARMS AND ARMOUR: A Critical Inquiry into Ancient Armour as it existed in Europe, but particularly in England, from the Norman Conquest to the Reign of Charles II.; with a Glossary, by Sir S. R. MEYRICK. New and greatly improved Edition, corrected throughout by the Author, with the assistance of ALBERT WAY and others. Illustrated by more than 100 Plates, splendidly illuminated in gold and silver; also an additional Plate of the Tournament of Locks and Keys. Three Vols. imperial 4to, half-morocco extra, gilt edges, £10 10s.

"While the splendour of the decorations of this work is well calculated to excite curiosity, the novel character of its contents, the very curious extracts from the rare MSS. in which it abounds, and the pleasing manner in which the author's antiquarian researches are prosecuted, will tempt many who take up the book in idleness, to peruse it with care. No previous work can be compared, in point of extent, arrangement, science, or utility, with the one now in question. 1st. It for the first time supplies, to our schools of art, correct and ascertained data for costume, in its noblest and most important branch—historical painting. 2nd. It affords a simple, clear, and most conclusive elucidation of a great number of passages in our great dramatic poets—ay, and in the works of those of Greece and Rome—against which commentators and scholiasts have been trying their wits for centuries. 3rd. It throws a flood of light upon the manners, usages, and sports of our ancestors, from the time of the Anglo-Saxons down to the reign of Charles the Second. And lastly, it at once removes a vast number of idle traditions and ingenious fables, which one compiler of history, copying from another, has succeeded in transmitting through the lapse of four or five hundred years.

MEYRICK'S ENGRAVED ILLUSTRATIONS OF ANCIENT

ARMS AND ARMOUR. 154 highly finished Etchings of the Collection at Goodrich Court, Herefordshire, engraved by JOSEPH SKELTON, with Historical and Critical Disquisitions by Sir S. R. MEYRICK. Two Vols. imperial 4to, with Portrait, half-morocco extra, gilt edges, £4 14s. 6d.

"We should imagine that the possessors of Dr. Meyrick's former great work would eagerly add Mr. Skelton's as a suitable illustration. In the first they have the history of Arms and Armour; in the second work, beautiful engravings of all the details, made out with sufficient minuteness to serve hereafter as patterns for artists or workmen."—Gentleman's Magazine.

MIDDLEMASS'S (Jean) NEW NOVEL.—MR. DORILLION:

A Novel. By JEAN MIDDLEMASS, Author of "Lil," "Wild Georgie," &c. Three Vols., crown 8vo, 31s. 6d.

MUSES OF MAYFAIR: Vers de Société of the Nineteenth Century. Including Selections from TENNYSON, BROWNING, SWINBURNE, ROSSETTI, JEAN INGLOW, LOCKER, INGOLDSBY, HOOD, LYTTON, C.S.C., LANDOR, AUSTIN DOBSON, HENRY LEIGH, &c. &c. Edited by H. CHOLMONDELEY-PENNELL. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, gilt, gilt edges, 7s. 6d.

BOOCADILLY NOVELS (The): Popular Stories by the Best Authors. Crown 8vo, carefully printed on creamy paper, and tastefully bound in cloth for the Library, price 6s. each.

WILKIE COLLINS.

THE WOMAN IN WHITE.

Illustrated by Sir J. GILBERT and F. A. FRASER.

ANTONINA.

Illustrated by Sir J. GILBERT and ALFRED CONCANEN.

BASIL.

Illustrated by Sir JOHN GILBERT and J. MAHONEY.

THE DEAD SECRET.

Illustrated by Sir JOHN GILBERT and H. FURNESS.

QUEEN OF HEARTS.

Illustrated by Sir J. GILBERT and A. CONCANEN.

THE MOONSTONE.

Illustrated by G. DU MAURIER and F. A. FRASER.

HIDE AND SEEK.

Illustrated by Sir JOHN GILBERT and J. MAHONEY.

MAN AND WIFE.

Illustrated by WILLIAM SMALL.

POOR MISS FINCH.

Illustrated by G. DU MAURIER and EDWARD HUGHES.

MISS OR MRS. P.

Illustrated by S. L. FILDES and HENRY WOODS.

THE NEW MAGDALEN.

Illustrated by DU MAURIER and C. S. R.

THE FROZEN DEEP.

Illustrated by DU MAURIER and J. MAHONEY.

MY MISCELLANIES.

With Steel Portrait, and Illustrations by A. CONCANEN.

THE LAW AND THE LADY.

Illustrated by S. L. FILDES and S. HALL.

"Like all the author's works, full of a certain power and ingenuity. . . . It is upon such suggestions of crime that the fascination of the story depends. . . . The reader feels it his duty to serve to the end upon the inquest on which he has been called by the author."—Times, in review of "The Law and the Lady."

"The greatest master the sensational novel has ever known."—World.

M. BETHAM-EDWARDS.

FELICIA.

[In the press.

E. LYNN LINTON.

PATRICIA KEMBALL.

With Frontispiece by DU MAURIER.

"A very clever and well-constructed story, original and striking, and interesting all through. A novel abounding in thought and power and interest."—Times.

"Displays genuine humour, as well as keen social observation. Enough graphic portraiture and witty observation to furnish materials for half-a-dozen novels of the ordinary kind."—Saturday Review.

KATHARINE S. MACQUOID.

THE EVIL EYE, AND OTHER STORIES.

Illustrated by THOMAS R. MACQUOID and PERCY MACQUOID.

"For Norman country life what the 'Johnny Ludlow' stories are for English rural delineation, that is, cameos delicately, if not very minutely or vividly wrought, and quite finished enough to give a pleasurable sense of artistic ease and faculty. A word of commendation is merited by the illustrations."—Academy.

HENRY KINGSLEY.

NUMBER SEVENTEEN.

"Quite sufficient plot and enough originality to form a charming story."—Echo.

FLORENCE MARRYAT.

OPEN! SESAME!

Illustrated by F. A. FRASER.

"A story which arouses and sustains the reader's interest to a higher degree than, perhaps, any of its author's former works. . . . A very excellent story."—Graphic.

PICCADILLY NOVELS, continued.

MRS. OLIPHANT.

WHITELADIES. With Illustrations by A. HOPKINS & H. WOODS."Is really a pleasant and readable book, written with practical ease and grace."
—Times.

JAMES PAYN, Author of "Lost Sir Massingberd."

THE BEST OF HUSBANDS. | WALTER'S WORD. Illus-
Illustrated by J. MOYR SMITH. | trated by J. MOYR SMITH."His novels are always commendable in the sense of art. They also possess another distinct claim to our liking: the girls in them are remarkably charming and true to nature, as most people, we believe, have the good fortune to observe nature represented by girls."—Spectator.

ANTHONY TROLLOPE.

THE WAY WE LIVE NOW. With Illustrations."Mr. Trollope has a true artist's idea of tone, of colour, of harmony; his pictures are one, and seldom out of drawing; he never strains after effect, is fidelity itself in expressing English life, is never guilty of caricature."—Fortnightly Review.

T. A. TROLLOPE.

DIAMOND CUT DIAMOND; and other Stories."The indefinable charm of Tuscan and Venetian life breathes in his pages."—Times."Full of life, of interest, of close observation, and sympathy. . . . When Mr. Trollope paints a scene, it is sure to be a scene worth painting."—Saturday Review.

JOHN SAUNDERS, Author of "Abel Drake's Wife."

BOUND TO THE WHEEL. | ONE AGAINST THE
GUY WATERMAN. | WORLD; or, Reuben's War.

Authors of "Gideon's Rock" and "Abel Drake's Wife."

THE LION IN THE PATH: An Historical Romance."A carefully written and beautiful story—a story of goodness and truth, which is yet as interesting as though it dealt with the opposite qualities. . . . The author of this really clever story has been at great pains to work out all its details with elaborate conscientiousness, and the result is a very vivid picture of the ways of life and habits of thought of a hundred and fifty years ago. . . . Certainly a very interesting book."—Times.

OUIDA.

*Uniform Edition, crown 8vo, red cloth extra, 5s. each.FOLLE FARINE.*IDALIA: A Romance.CHANDOS: A Novel.UNDER TWO FLAGS.*TRICOTRIN.*CECIL CASTLEMAINE'S
GAGE.HELD IN BONDAGE.*PASCAREL: Only a Story.PUCK: His Vicissitudes, Adventures, &c.A DOG OF FLANDERS.*STRATHMORE.*TWO LITTLE WOODEN SHOES.SIGNA."Keen poetic insight, an intense love of nature, a deep admiration of the beautiful form and colour, are the gifts of Ouida."—Morning Post.

PUGIN'S ARCHITECTURAL WORKS:—

Apology for the Revival of Christian Architecture. Illustrated by 10 large Etchings. Small 4to, cloth extra, 5s.

Examples of Gothic Architecture, selected from Ancient Edifices in England. 225 fine Engravings by LE KŒUX, with descriptive Letterpress by E. J. WILLSON. Three Vols. 4to, half-morocco, gilt back, £3 13s. 6d.

Floriated Ornaments. 31 Plates handsomely printed in Gold and Colours, with introductory Letterpress, royal 4to, half-morocco, £1 16s.

Gothic Ornaments. 90 Plates, by J. D. HARDING and others. Royal 4to, half-morocco, £1 16s.

Ornamental Timber Gables. 30 Plates. Royal 4to, half-mor., 18s.

Specimens of Gothic Architecture, from Ancient Edifices in England. 114 Outline Plates by LE KŒUX and others. With descriptive Letterpress and Glossary by E. J. WILLSON. Two Vols., 4to half-mor., £1 16s.

True Principles of Pointed or Christian Architecture. With 87 Illustrations. Small 4to, 10s. 6d.

PURSUIVANT OF ARMS (The); or, Heraldry founded upon Facts. A Popular Guide to the Science of Heraldry. By J. R. PLANCHÉ, Esq., Somerset Herald. To which are added, Essays on the BADGES OF THE HOUSES OF LANCASTER AND YORK. With Coloured Frontispiece, five full-page Plates, and about 200 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, gilt, 7s. 6d.

ABELAIS' WORKS. Faithfully translated from the French, with variorum Notes, and numerous Characteristic Illustrations by GUSTAVE DORÉ. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 700 pages, 7s. 6d.

ROLL OF BATTLE ABBEY; or, A List of the Principal Warriors who came over from Normandy with William the Conqueror, and Settled in this Country, A.D. 1066-7. Printed on fine plate paper, nearly three feet by two, with the principal Arms emblazoned in Gold and Colours. Price 5s.

ROLL OF CAERLAVEROCK, the Oldest Heraldic Roll; including the Original Anglo-Norman Poem, and an English Translation of the MS. in the British Museum. By THOMAS WRIGHT, M.A. The Arms emblazoned in Gold and Colours. In 4to, very handsomely printed, extra gold cloth, 12s.

ROWLANDSON (Thomas): HIS LIFE AND TIMES; The History of his Caricatures, and the Key to their Meaning. With very numerous full-page Plates and Wood Engravings. Demy 4to, cloth extra, gilt and gilt edges, 31s. 6d. [In preparation.]

SALA (George Augustus) ON COOKERY IN ITS HISTORICAL ASPECT. With very numerous Illustrations by the AUTHOR. Crown 4to, cloth extra, gilt. [In preparation.]

SANDWICH (Dr.) OF KARS.—MINSTERBOROUGH. A Tale of English Life. By HUMPHRY SANDWICH, C.B., D.C.L. Three Vols. crown 8vo, 31s. 6d.

SEVEN GENERATIONS OF EXECUTIONERS.

SANSON FAMILY, Memoirs of the, compiled from Private Documents in the possession of the Family (1688-1847), by HENRI SANSON. Translated from the French, with an Introduction by CAMILLE BARRÈRE. Two Vols. 8vo, cloth extra, 18s.

"A faithful translation of this curious work, which will certainly repay perusal,—not on the ground of its being full of horrors, for the original author seems to be rather ashamed of the technical aspect of his profession, and is commendably reticent as to its details, but because it contains a lucid account of the most notable causes célèbres from the time of Louis XIV. to a period within the memory of persons still living. . . . The Memoirs, if not particularly instructive, can scarcely fail to be extremely entertaining."—Daily Telegraph.

SHAKESPEARE.—THE LANSDOWNE EDITION. Beautifully printed in red and black, in small but very clear type. Post 8vo, with engraved facsimile of DROGHDA's Portrait, and 37 beautiful Steel Plates, after STOTHARD, cloth extra, gilt, gilt edges, 16s.

SHAKESPEARE, THE SCHOOL OF. Including "The Life and Death of Captain Thomas Stukeley," with a New Life of Stucley, from Unpublished Sources; "A Warning for Fair Women," with a Reprint of the Account of the Murder; "Nobody and Somebody;" "The Cobbler's Prophecy;" "Histriomastix;" "The Prodigal Son," &c. Edited, with Introductions and Notes, by R. SIMPSON, Author of "An Introduction to the Philosophy of Shakespeare's Sonnets." Two Vols., crown 8vo, cloth extra. [In the press.]

SHAKESPEARE.—THE FIRST FOLIO. MR. WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE'S Comedies, Histories, and Tragedies. Published according to the true Originall Copies. London, Printed by ISAAC IAGGARD and E.D. BLOUNT, 1623.—An exact Reproduction of the extremely rare Original, in reduced facsimile by a photographic process—ensuring the strictest accuracy in every detail. Small 8vo, hf. Roxburghe, 10s. 6d. A full Prospectus will be sent upon application.

"To Messrs. Chatto & Windus belongs the merit of having done more to facilitate the critical study of the text of our great dramatist than all the Shakespeare clubs and societies put together. A complete facsimile of the celebrated First Folio edition of 1623 for half-a-guinea is at once a miracle of cheapness and enterprise. Being in a reduced form, the type is necessarily rather diminutive, but it is as distinct as in a genuine copy of the original, and will be found to be as useful and far more handy to the student than the latter."—Athenaeum.

"SECRET OUT" SERIES. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, profusely Illustrated, price 4s. 6d. each.

Art of Amusing: A Collection of Graceful Arts, Games, Tricks, Puzzles, and Charades. By FRANK BELLEV. 300 Illustrations.

Hanky-Panky: Very Easy Tricks, Very Difficult Tricks, White Magic, Sleight of Hand. Edited by W. H. CREMER. 200 Illustrations.

Magician's Own Book: Performances with Cups and Balls, Eggs, Hats, Handkerchiefs, &c. All from Actual Experience. Edited by W. H. CREMER. 200 Illustrations.

Magic no Mystery: Tricks with Cards, Dice, Balls, &c., with fully descriptive Directions; the Art of Secret Writing; the Training of Performing Animals, &c. With Coloured Frontispiece and numerous Illusts.

Merry Circle (The): A Book of New Intellectual Games and Amusements. By CLARA BELLEV. Numerous Illustrations.

Secret Out: One Thousand Tricks with Cards, and other Recreations; with entertaining Experiments in Drawing-room or "White Magic." By W. H. CREMER. 300 Engravings.

SLANG DICTIONARY (The): Etymological, Historical, and Anecdotal. AN ENTIRELY NEW EDITION, revised throughout, and considerably Enlarged. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, gilt, 6s. 6d.

"We are glad to see the Slang Dictionary reprinted and enlarged. From a high scientific point of view this book is not to be despised. Of course it cannot fail to be amusing also. It contains the very vocabulary of unrestrained humour, and oddity, and grotesqueness. In a word, it provides valuable material both for the student of language and the student of human nature."—Academy.

"In every way a great improvement on the edition of 1864. Its uses as a dictionary of the very vulgar tongue do not require to be explained."—Notes and Queries.

"Compiled with most exacting care, and based on the best authorities."—Standard.

SHAW AND BRIDGENS' DESIGNS FOR FURNITURE, with Candelabra and Interior Decoration. 60 Plates, royal 4to, half-morocco £11s.; Large Paper, imperial 4to, the Plates Coloured, half-morocco, £2 2s.

SHAW'S ILLUMINATED WORKS:—

Ancient Furniture, drawn from existing Authorities. With Descriptions by Sir S. R. MERYCK. 4to, 74 Plates, half-morocco, £1 11s. 6d.; or, with some Plates Coloured, 4to, half-morocco, £2 2s.; Large Paper copies, impl. 4to, all the Plates extra finished in opaque Colours, half-morocco extra, £4 14s. 6d.

Dresses and Decorations of the Middle Ages, from the Seventh to the Seventeenth Centuries. 94 Plates, beautifully Coloured, a profusion of Initial Letters, and Examples of Curious Ornament, with Historical Introduction and Descriptive Text. Two Vols. imperial 8vo, half-Roxburghe, £5 5s.; large paper copies, the whole illuminated in body-colours, heightened with gold and silver, £14 14s.

Luton Chapel: A Series of 20 highly-finished Line Engravings of Gothic Architecture and Ornaments. Imperial folio, India Proofs, half-morocco, £2 8s.

Illuminated Ornaments of the Middle Ages, from the Sixth to the Seventeenth Century. Selected from Missals, MSS., and early printed Books. 66 Plates, carefully coloured from the Originals, with Descriptions by Sir F. MADDEN, Keeper of MSS., Brit. Mus. 4to, half-Roxburghe, £3 13s. 6d.; Large Paper copies, the Plates beautifully finished with opaque Colours and illuminated with Gold, imperial 4to, half-Roxburghe, £7 7s.

Ornamental Metal Work: A Series of 50 Copperplates, several Coloured. 4to, half-morocco, 18s.

Encyclopædia of Ornament. Select Examples from the purest and best Specimens of all kinds and all Ages. 4to, 59 Plates, half-morocco, £1 1s.; Large Paper copies, imperial 4to, with all the Plates Coloured, half-morocco, £2 12s. 6d.

SHERIDAN'S COMPLETE WORKS, with Life and Anecdotes.

Including his Dramatic Writings, printed from the Original Editions, his Works in Prose and Poetry, Translations, Speeches, Jokes, Puns, &c.; with a Collection of Sheridaniana. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, gilt, with 10 full-page Tinted Illustrations, 7s. 6d.

"Whatever Sheridan has done, has been, par excellence, always the best of its kind. He has written the best comedy (School for Scandal), the best drama (the Duenna), the best farce (the Critic), and the best address (Monologue on Garrick); and, to crown all, delivered the very best oration (the famous Begum Speech) ever conceived or heard in this country."—BYRON.

"The editor has brought together within a manageable compass not only the seven plays by which Sheridan is best known, but a collection also of his poetical pieces which are less familiar to the public, sketches of unfinished dramas, selections from his reported witticisms, and extracts from his principal speeches. To these is prefixed a short but well-written memoir, giving the chief facts in Sheridan's literary and political career; so that with this volume in his hand, the student may consider himself tolerably well furnished with all that is necessary for a general comprehension of the subject of it."—Pall Mall Gazette.

SILVESTRE'S UNIVERSAL PALÆOGRAPHY; or, A Collection of Facsimiles of the Writings of every Age. Containing upwards of 300 large and beautifully executed Facsimiles, taken from Missals and other MSS., richly Illuminated in the finest style of art. A New Edition, arranged under the direction of Sir F. MADDEN, Keeper of MSS., Brit. Mus. Two Vols. atlas folio, half-morocco, gilt, £31 20s.

"This great work contains upwards of three hundred large and beautifully executed facsimiles of the finest and most interesting MSS. of various ages and nations, illuminated in the highest style of art. The cost of getting up this splendid publication was not far from £90,000."—Allibon's Dictionary.

"The great work on Palæography generally—one of the most sumptuous works of its class ever published."—Chambers's Encyclopædia.

*. Also, a Volume of HISTORICAL AND DESCRIPTIVE LETTERPRESS, by CHAMPOLLION FIGEAC and CHAMPOLLION, Jun. Translated, with Additions, by Sir F. MADDEN. Two Vols. royal 8vo, half-morocco, gilt, £s 8s.

STRUTT'S SPORTS AND PASTIMES OF THE PEOPLE OF ENGLAND; including the Rural and Domestic Recreations, May Games, Mummeries, Shows, Processions, Pageants, and Pompous Spectacles, from the Earliest Period to the Present Time. With 140 Illustrations. Edited by WILLIAM HONE. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 7s. 6d.—A few LARGE PAPER COPIES, uniform with the "Dresses," with an extra set of Copperplate Illustrations, carefully Coloured by hand, from the Originals, 50s.

"The amusing pages of Strutt entitle his memory to great respect; and, borrowing the idea of Dr. Johnson, I will boldly affirm that he who wishes to be informed of the curious and interesting details connected with Ancient Manners and Customs, Costumes, Regal and Ecclesiastical Antiquities, must devote his days and his nights to the volumes of Strutt."—Dibdin's Decameron.

STRUTT'S REGAL AND ECCLESIASTICAL ANTIQUITIES OF ENGLAND: Authentic Representations of all the English Monarchs, from Edward the Confessor to Henry the Eighth; with many Great Personages eminent under their several Reigns. New Edition, with critical Notes by J. R. PLANCHE, Somerset Herald. Royal 4to, with 73 Engravings from Manuscripts, Monuments, &c., beautifully Coloured, half-Roxburghe, £3 3s.; or the Plates splendidly Illuminated in Gold and Colours, half-morocco, £10 10s.

MR. SWINBURNE'S NEW POEM.

ERECHTHEUS: A Tragedy. By ALGERNON CHARLES SWINBURNE. SECOND EDITION. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 6s.

"The harmony of all the parts is perfect. . . . Our Erechtheus is as living to us now as it could have been to an Athenian. . . . To such altitudes, rarely scaled by the feet of poets in the modern age, has he ascended. . . . Erechtheus is, in truth, a masterpiece. . . . a poem which appeals to men of all nations and of all times."—Academy.

"Matured thought and ripened power are brought to the task of reclothing old fables. Our extracts, copious as they are, fail to convey an idea of the sustained strength and beauty of the entire work, which we are inclined to rank as Mr. Swinburne's masterpiece."—Athenæum.

"Mr. Swinburne has written nothing near so good as this since he wrote 'Atalanta in Calydon.' . . . It would be difficult, in our opinion, to find a nearer approach to the terse and weighty dialogue of the Sophoclean tragedy than Mr. Swinburne gives us in the dialogue of his play. Exquisite sweetness and melody."—Spectator.

MR. SWINBURNE'S OTHER WORKS.

Queen Mother and Rosamond. Fcap. 8vo, 5s.

Atalanta in Calydon. A New Edition. Crown 8vo, 6s.

Chastelard. A Tragedy. Fcap. 8vo, 7s.

Poems and Ballads. Fcap. 8vo, 9s.

Notes on "Poems and Ballads." 8vo, 1s.

Essays and Studies. Crown 8vo, 12s.

Songs before Sunrise. Crown 8vo, 10s. 6d.

Bothwell: A Tragedy. Two Vols. crown 8vo, 12s. 6d.

George Chapman: An Essay. Crown 8vo, 7s.

Songs of two Nations: DIRÆ, A SONG OF ITALY, ODE ON THE FRENCH REPUBLIC. Crown 8vo, 6s.

William Blake: A Critical Essay. With Facsimile Paintings, Coloured by Hand, after Drawings by BLAKE and his Wife. Demy 8vo, 16s.

Also,

Rossetti's (W. M.) Criticism upon Swinburne's "Poems and Ballads." Fcap. 8vo, cloth extra, 3s. 6d.

THORNBURY'S (Walter) HISTORICAL AND LEGENDARY BALLADS AND SONGS. Illustrated by J. WHISTLER, JOHN TENNIEL, A. F. SANDYS, W. SMALL, M. J. LAWLESS, J. D. WATSON, G. J. PINWELL, F. WALKER, T. R. MACQUOID, and others. Handsomely printed, crown 4to, cloth extra, gilt and gilt edges, 21s.

"Mr. Thornbury has perceived with laudable clearness that one great requisite of poetry is that it should amuse. He rivals Goethe in the variety and startling incidents of his ballad-romances; he is full of vivacity and spirit, and his least impassioned pieces ring with a good out-of-doors music of sword and shield. Some of his mediæval poems are particularly rich in colour and tone; the 'Lady Witch,' 'John of Padua,' and, above all, 'The Jester's Moral,' are admirable cabinet pictures. The old Norse ballads, too, are worthy of great praise. Best of all, however, we like his Cavalier songs; there is nothing of the kind in English more spirited, masculine, and merry."—Academy.

"Will be welcomed by all true lovers of art. . . . We must be grateful that so many works of a school distinguished for its originality should be collected into a single volume."—Saturday Review.

"Who has not thrilled over such songs as 'Trample, trample, went the roan,' or 'The death of King Warwolf'?—and who needs to be told that the illustrations are above price when they are by such men as Tenniel, Sandys, Whistler, and the lamented Fred Walker? The book is beautifully got up."—Morning Post.

TOURNEUR'S (Cyril) COLLECTED WORKS, including a unique Poem, entitled "The Transformed Metamorphosis;" and "Laugh and Lie Down; or, The World's Folly." Now first Collected and Edited, with Critical Preface, Introductions, and copious Notes, by J. CHURTON COLLINS. Post 8vo, cloth extra, price 10s. 6d. [In the press.]

TURNER'S (J. M. W.) LIFE AND CORRESPONDENCE. Founded upon Letters and Papers furnished by his Friends and Fellow-Academicians. By WALTER THORNBURY. A New Edition, entirely rewritten and considerably enlarged. With numerous Illustrations. Two Vols. demy 8vo, cloth extra. [In the press.]

TURNER GALLERY (The): A Series of Sixty Engravings from the Principal Works of JOSEPH MALLORD WILLIAM TURNER. With a Memoir and Illustrative Text by RALPH NICHOLSON WORNUM, Keeper and Secretary, National Gallery. Handsomely half-bound, India Proofs, royal folio, £10; Large Paper copies, Artists' India Proofs, elephant folio, £20.—A Descriptive Pamphlet will be sent upon application.

"To those whose memories are old enough to go back through any considerable portion of Turner's life, or who may have seen the majority of the pictures he painted during so many years of loving labour, it will be at once manifest that no better selection could have been made of paintings which could be got at by any reasonable means. Many of his grandest productions are in this series of engravings, and the ablest landscape engravers of the day have been employed on the plates, among which are some that, we feel assured, Turner himself would have been delighted to see. These proof impressions constitute a volume of exceeding beauty, which deserves to find a place in the library of every man of taste. The number of copies printed is too limited for a wide circulation, but, on that account, the rarity of the publication makes it the more valuable.

"A series of engravings from Turner's finest pictures, and of a size and quality commensurate with their importance, has not till now been offered to the public; nor, indeed, could it have been produced but for the glorious legacy bequeathed to the country. During his lifetime he exercised supreme control over his works, and would allow none to be engraved but what he chose; the large sums, moreover, paid to him for 'touching the proofs,' which he considered equivalent to what he would have received for copyright, acted almost as a prohibition to such engravings getting into the hands of any but the opulent.

"It is not too much to affirm that a more beautiful and worthy tribute to the genius of the great painter does not exist, and is not likely to exist at any future time."—Art Journal.

TIMBS' CLUBS AND CLUB LIFE IN LONDON. With

ANECDOTES of its FAMOUS COFFEE HOUSES, HOSTELRIES, and TAVERNS. By JOHN TIMBS, F.S.A. Numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, gilt, 7s. 6d.

"The book supplies a much-felt want. The club is the avenue to general society at the present day, and Mr. Timbs gives the entrée to the club. The scholar and antiquary will also find the work a repertory of information on many disputed points of literary interest, and especially respecting various well-known anecdotes, the value of which only increases with the lapse of time."—Morning Post.

TIMBS' ENGLISH ECCENTRICS and ECCENTRICITIES:

Stories of Wealth and Fashion, Delusions, Impostures and Fanatic Missions, Strange Sights and Sporting Scenes, Eccentric Artists, Theatrical Folks, Men of Letters, &c. By JOHN TIMBS, F.S.A. With nearly 50 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 7s. 6d.

"The reader who would fain enjoy a harmless laugh in some very odd company might do much worse than take an occasional dip into 'English Eccentrics.' The illustrations are admirably suited to the letterpress."—Graphic.

TROLLOPE'S (Anthony) THE WAY WE LIVE NOW. II.

Illustrated Library Edition. Two Vols. 8vo, cloth extra, with 40 full-page Plates, 12s. See also "Piccadilly Novels."

VAGABONDIANA; or, Anecdotes of Mendicant Wanderers through the Streets of London; with Portraits of the most Remarkable, drawn from the Life by JOHN THOMAS SMITH, late Keeper of the Prints in the British Museum. With Introduction by FRANCIS DOUCE, and Descriptive Text. With the Woodcuts and the 32 Plates, from the original Coppers. Crown 4to, half-Roxburghe, 12s. 6d.

WALTON AND COTTON, ILLUSTRATED.—THE COMPLETE ANGLER; or, The Contemplative Man's Recreation: Being a Discourse of Rivers, Fish-ponds, Fish and Fishing, written by IZAAK WALTON; and Instructions how to Angle for a Trout or Grayling in a clear Stream, by CHARLES COTTON. With Original Memoirs and Notes by Sir HARRIS NICOLAS, K.C.M.G. With the 61 Plate Illustrations, precisely as in Pickering's two-volume Edition. Complete in One Volume, large crown 8vo, cloth antique, 7s. 6d.

"Among the reprints of the year, few will be more welcome than this edition of the 'Complete Angler,' with Sir Harris Nicolas's Memoirs and Notes, and Stothard and Inskipp's illustrations."—Saturday Review.

"As a book, the volume before us is neatly trimmed and winsome to the eye. There is room for it in the world among its predecessors, and in the getting up the publishers have done it every justice."—Academy.

WELLS' JOSEPH AND HIS BRETHREN: A Dramatic Poem.

By CHARLES WELLS. With an Introductory Essay by ALGERNON CHARLES SWINBURNE. Crown 8vo, with Vignette Portrait, cloth extra, 9s.

"The author of 'Joseph and his Brethren' will some day have to be acknowledged among the memorable men of the second great period in our poetry. . . . There are lines even in the overture of his poem which might, it seems to me, more naturally be mistaken even by an expert in verse for the work of the young Shakspeare, than any to be gathered elsewhere in the fields of English poetry."—SWINBURNE.

"In its combination of strength and delicacy, in sweet liquid musical flow, in just cadence, and in dramatic incisiveness of utterance, the language throughout keeps closer to the level of the Elizabethan dramatists than that of any dramatist of subsequent times. . . . Mr. Swinburne does not praise the character of Phrassanor over-much when he places it only behind the Cleopatra of Shakspeare, and adds that all women in literature after these two seem coarse or trivial when they touch on anything sensual. A poet has been saved from oblivion, and the present and future generations will be richer by a work they could ill afford to lose."—Athenæum.

WARRANT TO EXECUTE CHARLES I. An exact Facsimile of this important Document, with the Fifty-nine Signatures of the Regicides, and corresponding Seals, on paper to imitate the Original, 22 in. by 14 in. Price 2s.

WARRANT TO EXECUTE MARY QUEEN OF SCOTS. An exact Facsimile of this important Document, including the Signature of Queen Elizabeth and Facsimile of the Great Seal, on tinted paper, to imitate the Original MS. Price 2s.

WILD'S CATHEDRALES. Select examples of the Ecclesiastical Architecture of the Middle Ages; arranged in Two Series (the First FOREIGN, the Second ENGLISH). Each Series containing Twelve fine Plates, mounted upon Cardboard, and carefully Coloured, after the Original Drawings by CHARLES WILD. In a portfolio, £4 4s. each series.

"These splendid plates are unequalled, whether bound as a volume, treasured in a portfolio, or framed for universal admiration."—Athenaeum.

WILSON'S AMERICAN ORNITHOLOGY; or, Natural History of the Birds of the United States; with the Continuation by Prince CHARLES LUCIAN BONAPARTE. NEW AND ENLARGED EDITION, completed by the insertion of above One Hundred Birds omitted in the original Work, and Illustrated by valuable Notes, and Life of the Author, by Sir WILLIAM JARDINE. Three Vols., 8vo, with a fine Portrait of WILSON, and 103 Plates, exhibiting nearly four hundred figures of Birds accurately engraved and beautifully printed in Colours, cloth extra, gilt, £3 3s. Also, a few Large Paper copies, quarto, with the Plates all carefully Coloured by hand, at £6 6s.

"The History of American Birds by Alexander Wilson is equal in elegance to the most distinguished of our own splendid works on Ornithology."—CUVIER.

"With an enthusiasm never excelled, this extraordinary man penetrated through the vast territories of the United States, undeterred by forests or swamps, for the sole purpose of describing the native birds."—LORD BROUGHAM.

"By the mere force of native genius, and of delight in nature, he became, without knowing it, a good, a great writer."—Blackwood's Magazine.

WRIGHT'S CARICATURE HISTORY of the GEORGES (House of Hanover). With 400 Pictures, Caricatures, Squibs, Broad-sides, Window Pictures, &c. By THOMAS WRIGHT, Esq., M.A., F.S.A. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 7s. 6d.

"Emphatically one of the liveliest of books, as also one of the most interesting. Has the twofold merit of being at once amusing and edifying."—Morning Post.

WRIGHT'S HISTORY OF CARICATURE AND OF THE GROTESQUE IN ART, LITERATURE, SCULPTURE, AND PAINTING, from the Earliest Times to the Present Day. By THOMAS WRIGHT, M.A., F.S.A. Profusely Illustrated by F. W. FAIRHOLT, F.S.A. Large post 8vo, cloth extra, gilt, 7s. 6d.

"Almost overwhelms us with its infinite research. Mr. Wright dexterously guides the reader to a full survey of our English caricature, from its earliest efforts to the full-blown blossoms of a Rowlandson or a Gillray. The excellent illustrations of Mr. Fairholt add greatly to the value of the volume."—Graphic.

"A very amusing and instructive volume."—Saturday Review.

